HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 12, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The following prayer was offered by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

Our fathers' God and our God, we lift up our hearts in gratitude to Thee for our Republic, which has come down to us out of the past a precious and matchless heritage, and for that long line of illustrious men who, guided by the light of heaven, conceived, resolved, upheld, and maintained it; and may they ever be as beacon lights to guide us as we lengthen its history.

To-day our minds and hearts turn with one accord to the martyred Lincoln, whom in the darkest hours of the Republic Thou didst call from obscurity to be the savior of his people. We love him and honor him for what he did, yet more for what he was in the nobility, strength, and gentleness of his character, "With malice toward none and charity for all."

God grant that our lives may be as pure, as noble, as generous, as patriotic. In the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of Friday's proceedings was read and approved.

PHARMACY AND POISONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8997) to regulate the practice of pharmacy and the sale of poisons in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks for present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read at length.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, and ask unanimous consent that the amendments of the Senate to that bill be disagreed to, and that the House ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to take the urgent deficiency bill from the Speaker's table, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I understand that that course is favored by the minority members of the committee also.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection; and the Chair announces as conferees on the part of the House Mr. LITTAUER, Mr. TAWNEY, and Mr. LIVINGSTON.

CLOAKROOM EMPLOYEES.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia for a moment.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to enter a motion to reconsider House resolution 145, relating to cloakroom employees.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The Journal of the House having been approved, the motion of the gentleman is not now in order.

The SPEAKER. A motion to reconsider was not entered upon agreeing to the resolution, which was considered on Friday. Under the rule the motion is in order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I make the further point of order that the gentleman who offered the resolution and presumably voted in favor of it can not now move to reconsider it under the rule.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that, there being no record vote, every Member stands upon the same parliamentary level with every other Member. It seems to the Chair any one of the 386 Members might enter the motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from West Virginia enter the motion for immediate consideration?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin yields to the gentleman from West Virginia, who enters the motion, and that motion can be called up at any time when it is in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the question because I prefer that the gentleman would not take action upon it until the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] is present.

Mr. HUGHES. That is my intention. I only enter the motion now that I may not lose my rights.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman from West Virginia be good enough to inform the House what is the purpose of moving a reconsideration of this resolution?

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I did not yield to the gentleman for the purpose of debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin declines to yield further. The motion will lie over.

PHARMACY AND POISONS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] to explain the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the bill which has just been read is one which provides for the regulation of the practice of pharmacy and the sale of poisons in the District of Columbia. It is particularly aimed at and is an effort to check the drug habit which has become so prevalent in this District and other great cities of this country. This bill is the result of careful study and consideration and was prepared, in fact, by the commissioners of pharmacy of the District of Columbia after six months of careful work on their part. It is also approved by the District Commissioners and has the unanimous approval of a conference composed of the representatives of the physicians, the pharmacists, and the National College of Pharmacy of the District of Columbia. This committee has, in addition to these precautions, had several public hearings, in which the persons interested, the pharmacists themselves, have been given hearings, and all of whom earnestly urge favorable action.

The fact of the matter is that the present law regulating the practice of pharmacy was passed in 1878, nearly thirty years ago, at a time when the drug habit, now so prevalent, scarcely existed. So that the present law is obviously imperfect and unable to cope with the cocaine habit and other drug habits now so prevalent. In fact, cocaine was not discovered at that time. Section 11 of this bill and section 12 of this bill strike directly at the drug-habit evil. Section 11 provides that no druggist can sell cocaine or other drug-habit drugs except upon prescription of a duly authorized physician, and then only once on that prescription. Section 12 prohibits a physician from prescribing one of the drug-habit drugs to persons addicted to the habit of using drugs except when it is necessary in the treatment of the habit.

The bill is necessarily long because it embodies several features which include the general pharmacy law, the poison law, the antinarcotic law, and then it places it all under the direction of a supervisory board, with the health officer of the District of Columbia as the secretary.

The first ten sections of the bill provide rules for the admission to and the regulation of the practice of pharmacy. Sections 11 and 12 strike directly at the drug-habit evil. Section 13 is a general poison law, and provides the necessary precautionary measures in the sale of poisons. Section 14 is a provision to prevent an evasion of the law by fraud. Section 15 provides for publicity in filing prescriptions for drugs of this kind. Section 16 is an attempt to stop the promiscuous throwing about on the doorsteps of samples of headache and other dangerous preparations. This was incorporated because of the fact that statistics show that numerous cases of severe sickness, and in some cases death, has resulted by children picking up these samples and taking them without knowledge of their dangerous qualities. The balance of the sections provide for penalties and the method of enforcement.

In other words, this whole act places the practice of pharmacy on the same high plane that the profession of medicine now is placed, and I think that everyone who is familiar with the bill, or has followed the reading of it, will agree that it is a splendid piece of legislation and a long step in the right direction.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Section 10 of the bill provides that the expenses shall be paid from the fees. Suppose the fees of the applicants are not sufficient to pay the expenses. Where does the money come from?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. The bill provides that it shall be paid from fees, and I presume that the fees will be sufficient to pay. If not, the bill does not make any other provision.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is there any estimate of the number of pharmacists who will be included under this bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. No; we have no estimate of the number, but it would not be hard to obtain.

The pharmacists themselves who are engaged in the practice of pharmacy in this District believe that the fees for licenses will fully pay for all expenses.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the opinion of the committee? I do not care for the opinion of the pharmacists.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. The opinion of the committee is based on hearings of pharmacists and other persons interested, and the committee is of the opinion that this will be the case, and no other provision for the payment of the expenses has been made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Can the gentleman give an estimate of the amount of fees per year?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. No; we have no estimate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This same section has a very peculiar provision, which provides that the board shall divide up all the fees that are left after paying the expenses of the board for their services. Was it the opinion of the committee that no limitation whatever should be placed upon the amount paid to the examiners?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I will say that in a letter from the Commissioners, referring to section 10, they state that the fees accruing to the board are to be used, first, to pay its expenses; second, to pay the lay members, as directed by the Commissioners, and any balance remaining may be divided among the several examining boards in proportion to the number of candidates examined by each.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then each of these examining boards determines for itself how much each member of that board shall get out of the money spent?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Each of these examining boards receives its money in proportion to the number of applicants they examine, after all the expenses and the lay members are paid.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And then the board proceeds to divide whatever amount it gets among its own members according to its own judgment?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. It does not provide for an unequal distribution. It provides that the balance left after all expenses shall be paid to the boards in proportion to the number of candidates they have examined.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The purpose is to make it sure that there will be no surplus returned into the treasury of the District of Columbia.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Well, there will not be any surplus.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not under the operations of this bill. That is apparent.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Under any circumstances there would not be any surplus.

Mr. FITZGERALD. One other question. In section 19 of the bill, why is it specifically provided that the superintendent of police and the corporation counsel shall be charged with the enforcement of this law? Is it the practice to insert in these bills the officials that shall be charged with the enforcement of the different laws that shall be enacted?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes; it is customary. I doubt its necessity, but it is customary to state things specifically when we know the specific person who should perform the duty.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Would not the law be enforced under the operation of the general laws of the District? Why is it necessary to specifically designate?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Can the gentleman suggest any harm in being specific in one of these statutes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know the results that will follow from this. Both of these officials will be coming here for additional help in order to perform the duties which they will claim are imposed upon them by this law. If the gentleman will yield for that purpose, I would like to offer an amendment to strike lines 18, 19, and 20 out, on page 22 of this act.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I shall not yield for any such purpose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, is it the intention of the chairman of this committee to refuse an opportunity to amend bills of this character? If it is, he will not succeed in passing his bills as easily as he may imagine.

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, the gentleman can take that responsibility. I desire to say in reference to this bill that it is a proposition which has been under consideration for more than twenty-five years.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not this particular bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. Two years ago, when this proposition was before the committee and the medical society, it was opposed by certain manufacturers of patent medicines that came before the society and admitted that they were using in their preparations one-half a grain of morphine to each fluid ounce. An ounce is two tablespoonfuls. The ordinary dose of the medicine is one tablespoonful, and in that dose you get a quarter of a grain of morphine. Their opposition and the failure to agree on the part of the medical society, the pharmacists, and the Commissioners prevented its being reported to the House. The effect of the consideration two years ago has been that these manufacturers have reduced the amount of morphine in these patent medicines to the limit in this bill—one-quarter of a grain to an ounce—which certainly ought to be enough.

And when the gentleman understands the great work that has been done by the medical society, by the Society of Pharmaceutists, by the Commissioners, and the effort for years, I certainly do not think he would want to impede the passage of this legislation. I have had come to my house, day and night, mothers, widows, and parents begging for some legislation that would prevent their children being able to buy cocaine. The cocaine habit has grown in Washington here in the last five years until it is a thousand times worse than the alcohol habit. There is more suffering from it. This bill seeks primarily to regulate the sale of poisons and to control the sale of narcotics. Now, so far as the execution of the law is concerned, it is the ordinary course that has been provided for. That is all I have to say, and I do hope the gentleman will not offer an amendment when he realizes the work that has been done in the preparation and perfection of this measure and in view of the agreement that has been reached by all interested.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is familiar with the manner in which bills are reported from his committee.

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman please speak a little louder?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Whenever his committee reports a bill to regulate any particular business and provides means for the enforcement of the law, so far as my knowledge goes it has not been the practice to specifically designate certain officials to enforce those laws. I have no objection to the passage of this bill. I think it will accomplish some good, but I have objection to giving any official some ground on which he can come to the Committee on Appropriations late in this session and say by reason of being named in this bill to enforce this law he requires additional help and more money for his department. This law will be enforced just as effectually without that language being in it.

Mr. BABCOCK. The specific purpose, if I understand the gentleman, is contained in these three lines: "And it shall be the duty of the major and superintendent of police of the District of Columbia and corporation counsel of said District to enforce the provisions of this act." Now, it is sought to make that specific so that it will be enforced and so that it can not be said that no one is charged with it, and the bill makes it the specific duty of those officers to enforce it as though it were any other violation of law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of the superintendent of police to enforce all laws which provide penalties for violation, and under the provisions of this act it would be the duty of the corporation counsel to institute proceedings to revoke licenses when requested by the Commissioners of the District. This language will have the effect of bringing here some time or other these two officials of the District of Columbia, who will point to this law and say under the operations of that law they require additional help, which in my judgment they will not require, and I suggest to the gentleman that it will not make much difficulty to give the House an opportunity to decide whether that language should be put in there.

Mr. BABCOCK. I do not think there is any objection to it, but it will simply tend to weaken the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It will not help the bill if we give it, and in my judgment it will improve it very much if we leave that language out. If the gentleman will give the House a chance to pass on that question that is all I care for. And if more Members agree with me than with him, unquestionably it would go out.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me three minutes?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the gentleman from New York in his criticism of this bill. It seems that his criticism is based upon the fact that we direct certain officials connected with the court and police authorities to enforce this law. Possibly under the general law that might be their duty, but by specifically telling them to do it so emphasizes the importance of enforcing this law. It shows that Congress is more in earnest in having this law enforced than if we did not specifically direct them to do so. I think the bill would be improved on if we would also add words something like these, "And the court having jurisdiction shall charge the grand jury at its regular term to investigate alleged violations of this law." One of the great weaknesses, gentlemen, in our trust law, as I have contended here for ten years, is the fact that the people can not go before the grand jury and indict trusts. Under the present "practice" at least the Attorney-General of the United States has the right to say yes or no about indicting anybody or thing. He directs the district attorney to close or open the doors of the grand jury to the people, which is wrong. The people ought to have the legal right in this District and elsewhere to appear before the grand jury and tell them of unlawful acts. No officer should have the right to close the doors to the grand jury.

I heartily approve of the proposition that the corporation counsel shall see that this law is vigorously enforced, and I hope the gentleman from Michigan will offer an amendment saying that the judge in charge—the court having jurisdiction—shall especially charge the grand jury at each term of the court. Then you will get your law enforced.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a question for information.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How does it happen that nobody can offer an amendment to one of these committee bills?

Mr. BABCOCK. I do not think anything of that kind has happened. The gentleman from Ohio declined to yield in his time for the offering of an amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When can an amendment be offered to it?

Mr. BABCOCK. There will be opportunity, unless the previous question is asked.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but that is just exactly the trick it is done with—namely, to insist on the previous question. I do not care a straw about this——

Mr. BABCOCK. I will say to the gentleman I do not intend to call for the previous question. This bill must stand on its merits.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to say this, that I do not care anything about this bill, because I do not know anything about it; but I am opposed to the Committee on the District of Columbia or any other committee bringing a bill here and then rearing back on its pastern joints and saying that it shall not be amended. [Laughter.]

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the gentleman from New York not to offer an amendment, not to weaken the bill, but to let it go into law with its full force—with the officers mentioned charged to enforce the provisions of it. That is what I ask of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Now I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, it must appear to every man in this House that this is a bill dealing with matters decidedly technical. The physicians, pharmacists, and druggists of this city, as they stated before our committee, have been working for ten years, and this is the bill prepared by them as a result of that ten years of effort. It is intended to be as complete and perfect as those men can make it. I am not in harmony with the idea that we should shut off amendments by calling for the previous question; but if you undertake to amend this bill and pass it as amended, you may help it or you may not. It will be like shooting in the dark, unless the party who offers the amendment has special information on the subject.

I want to say frankly, as a member of the District Committee, that I do not know how to improve this bill—and I studied it as well as I possibly could—because I have not that technical training necessary to properly judge of it. But the objection of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] seems to be based wholly upon the idea that it may in some way, by its enforcement, increase expenditures, and that there will have to be an additional appropriation in consequence thereof. I do not know whether that is true or not, but if, in order for this District to have a proper law, properly enforced, to stop the wholesale poisoning and the making of lunatics and maniacs in this District, and it does call for a little additional appropriation, I say, why not give it? Who wants to cause our asylums to be run over with maniacs and lunatics by the reason of the lack of such a law as this? We have got to take care of the asylums. We have got to go to the Appropriations Committee for that. I do not measure the value of legislation entirely upon whether it is to cost us nothing or not. If it benefits us, and the fees do not pay the expenses, the great Appropriations Committee of the House, of which the gentleman from New York is an honored and most valuable member, will judge of that when the matter is presented to them. If it should require a little additional expense to suppress as far as possible this death-dealing drug abuse in the District of Columbia, let us have it. And who is to judge of it if it is not the physicians and pharmacists and druggists who have practical and professional knowledge of it?

If we undertake to amend this bill, in all probability we will simply ruin it. That will be the result of it. I am the last Member of this House to advocate the shutting off of amendment and debate; but I appeal to the Members, as does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK], that you do not offer an amendment unless you are sure it will not injure but, on the contrary, help the bill.

Sometimes we are ready on very slight consideration to offer amendments to a bill on the floor of the House we would not offer if we more fully understood it. I could not prepare a bill like this. I have not the requisite knowledge. Perhaps there are Members of the House who do have it, and we should have been very glad to have them appear before the committee. This is a long bill, technical in character, and I believe a very necessary and useful bill. We have got to rely on somebody, and if we can not rely on the druggists and the pharmacists and the physicians of this District when we have to prepare and introduce legislation that will bring about the particular results sought to be accomplished by this bill, where are we to go? How many of you gentlemen would go into that subject and study it so fully as to be able to thoroughly understand it before introducing a measure of this kind? I hope no serious effort will be made to amend this bill. I express the hope simply because I am afraid that in undertaking to make it better it may be made worse.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from New York, if he wishes to offer an amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to offer an amendment striking out lines 18, 19, and 20 on page 22; and I would like about three minutes on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Page 22, strike out lines 18, 19, and 20.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman to yield to me about three minutes.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this proposed law prohibits certain things in the District of Columbia and provides a penalty for the commission of them. It will be the duty of the police department to enforce this law. There is a provision in the bill which provides for the revocation of licenses upon certain complaints made by the Commissioners by proceedings in court. It will be the duty of the corporation counsel to take the proceedings when directed to do so by the Commissioners. To specifically designate these officers to enforce this law is entirely unnecessary. It is never the practice in legislation fixing crimes and penalties for their commission in the United States to provide specifically that the district attorneys shall enforce those laws.

It is an innovation to place this provision in this bill. To have the officers who are to administer this law alluded to in the act, or the official specially designated, gives them an excuse to come in and ask for assistants to enforce the law, merely because they have been enumerated in the bill. I can not see how it will harm this bill to amend it in the way I have suggested. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] seems to imagine that because his committee has brought a long bill in here it would be dangerous for anybody else to have an opinion in regard to it that is different from that of the committee. It will be his privilege to vote as he pleases on the amendment; but I hope the House will not initiate this scheme of specifically naming the officer whose duty it is to enforce the law. It is presumed that they will perform their duty and enforce the law without such an enactment.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the gentleman from New York seem to me to be remarkable. He seems to have great fear that by putting a statement in the bill stating clearly as to what officers shall perform this duty, it will be a serious matter. This provision does not in any way take from anybody else, whose duty it is to cause the laws to be enforced, that privilege or duty. It merely provides, where it is necessary to make an examination of books kept by pharmacists in this city, or in any other manner enforce the law, it shall be the duty of the major, or superintendent of the police force, to execute this law, and to see that the poisons, the sale of which we are seeking to control, are not improperly sold. What harm can it do to the bill to put this provision in? It might do very serious harm to leave it out. The bill has been reported after most careful consideration by the Committee on the District of Columbia after hearing from the pharmacists of the District. It has also been reported after very careful consideration by the Commissioners of the District and the District attorney; and it seems to me most remarkable to ask to have an amendment put in that is of such a trivial purpose, which can not do any good, and might do incalculable harm. I hope that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. BABCOCK. I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I want to offer an amendment.

After the word "act," on page 22, line 20, add this:

And the courts having jurisdiction shall charge regularly their grand juries to investigate alleged violations of this law.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "act," in line 20, page 22, insert "and the courts having jurisdiction shall charge regularly their grand juries to investigate alleged violations of this law."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BANKS AND TRUST COMPANIES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for present consideration of the bill (H. R. 118) to amend sections 713 and 714 of "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901, as amended by the acts approved January 31 and June 30, 1902, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 713 and 714 of an act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901, as amended by the acts approved January 31 and June 30, 1902, are hereby amended so as, respectively, to read as follows:

"SEC. 713. All savings banks, or savings companies, or trust companies, or other banking institutions, organized under authority of any act of Congress to do business in the District of Columbia, or organized by virtue of the laws of any of the States of this Union, and having an office or banking house located within the District of Columbia where deposits or savings are received, shall be, and are hereby, required to make to the Comptroller of the Currency and to publish all the reports which national banking associations are required to make and publish under the provisions of sections 5211, 5212, and 5213 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and shall be subject to the same penalties for failure to make such reports as are therein provided, which penalties may be collected by suit before the supreme court of the District of Columbia. And the Comptroller shall have power, when in his opinion it is necessary, to take possession of any such bank or company, for the reasons and in the manner and to the same extent as are provided in the laws of the United States with respect to national banks.

"SEC. 714. The Comptroller of the Currency, in addition to the powers now conferred upon him by law for the examination of national banks, is hereby further authorized, whenever he may deem it useful, to cause examination to be made into the condition of any bank mentioned in the preceding section. The expense of such examination shall be paid in the manner provided by section 5240 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the examination of national banks.

"SEC. 714*a*. The Comptroller of the Currency, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is further authorized to make rules for the regulation of the banking business within the District of Columbia by the banks mentioned in section 713, and to provide for the enforcement of such regulations by the assessment of reasonable fines, which may be collected by suit before the supreme court of the District of Columbia. The expenses of such suit shall be paid from the proceeds of the fines collected, and the balance shall be annually paid to the Treasurer of the United States."

With the following amendment:

On page 1, line 9, after "companies," insert "or trust companies."

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KLINE].

Mr. KLINE. Mr. Speaker, this bill contemplates the extension of the provisions of sections 713 and 714 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia to savings banks, savings companies, trust companies, or other banking institutions, organized by virtue of the laws of any of the States of the Union, having an office or banking house within the District where deposits or savings are received; and it also contemplates the enlargement of the powers of the Comptroller of the Currency in his supervision and regulation of banks, savings companies, trust companies, or other banking institutions, authorized under authority of any act of Congress, doing business in the District of Columbia, and organized by virtue of the laws of any of the States of the Union.

Section 713 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia provides that all savings banks or savings companies or institutions organized under authority of any act of Congress, doing business in the District of Columbia, shall be required to make to the Comptroller of the Currency, and publish all the reports which national banking associations are required to make and publish, under the provisions of sections 5211, 5212, and 5213 of the Revised Statutes, and that they shall be subject to the same penalties for failure to make or publish such reports as are provided in said sections of the Revised Statutes.

Section 5211 of the Revised Statutes provides, among other things, that national banks shall make to the Comptroller of the Currency not less than five reports during each year, according to the form prescribed by the Comptroller, and in addition to said reports they may be required to make special reports.

Section 5212, among other things, provides that every national bank shall within ten days after the declaration of any dividend make a report to the Comptroller of the Currency, showing the amount of the dividend and the amount of net earnings in excess of such dividend.

From information and advices received, there are now nine savings banks or banking institutions, organized and incorporated by the laws of the States of Virginia, West Virginia, and Connecticut, engaged in business in the District of Columbia, where they are receiving deposits and savings. These institutions are presently only amenable to the laws of the several States from which they have received their several rights of organization or incorporation. They are presently amenable to no Federal regulation or control. Some of these institutions have been doing business in the District for many years. They have established their banking houses in the District permissibly, without any objection, and apparently have been continuing their business by a comity between the several States and the District of Columbia.

Several of these institutions have no office or place of business where they receive deposits or savings in the States under whose laws they have been incorporated. The People's Bank, the Ætna Bank and Trust Company, the Union Savings Bank, and Washington Savings Bank are incorporated under the laws of the State of West Virginia. The Home Savings Bank, the Merchants and Mechanics' Savings Bank, the McLaughlin Real Estate and Loan Company, and the Potomac Savings Bank are incorporated under the laws of the State of Virginia; and the International Banking Corporation is incorporated under the laws of the State of Connecticut.

The People's Bank, the Ætna Bank and Trust Company, the Home Savings Bank, the Union Savings Bank, and Washington Savings Bank are, respectively, capitalized at $100,000, and the Merchants and Mechanics' Savings Bank and the Potomac Savings Bank have a capital of $50,000 each. The McLaughlin Real Estate and Loan Company has a paid-up capital of $54,950, according to its last statement, and the International Banking Corporation is capitalized at $3,250,000, has a surplus of $3,250,000, and its aggregate assets, according to a statement made on June 30, 1905, amounted to $32,472,426.54.

The latter-named banking corporation has its principal office and place of business in the city of New York, with branches and agencies in Washington and other cities of the United States, as well as in foreign countries. These several institutions have established a large and extensive trade, and apparently have acquired the confidence of the general public.

National banks, as is well known, under the national banking law, must make to the Comptroller of the Currency no less than five reports during each year, according to the form which may be prescribed by him, verified by oath or affirmation of the president or cashier of such association, and in most of the States the banking laws provide for a commissioner of banking, or some similar official, who, through his staff of examiners, makes annual or semiannual examinations of State banks, savings institutions, and trust companies, and in addition to said examinations such companies are required, according to the laws of some of the States, to furnish sworn statements of condition twice a year.

I am told that several of these institutions doing business in the District, organized under State laws, voluntarily make reports of their resources and liabilities and cause the same to be published at periods of time when the Comptroller of the Currency makes call for reports from national banks.

By section 714a the powers of the Comptroller of the Currency are enlarged; he is authorized, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to make rules for the regulation of the banking business within the District of Columbia, by the several classes of banks and institutions mentioned in section 713. This power should be vested in the Comptroller of the Currency. He is familiar with this class of business, and, with approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, can make more appropriate and effective rules for the regulation and supervision of this class of banking than possibly Congress would be enabled to enact.

These several institutions mentioned in section 713, organized under the laws of the States, receiving deposits and savings, doing business under the power and authority granted to them by their several acts of incorporation, and having acquired the business and confidence of the general public in the District, not now amenable to any Federal regulation, should be made amenable to some supervising authority.

The committee has considered that the law intended to be enacted by this bill is a wise and meritorious safeguard. The Comptroller of the Currency approves of this legislation; it has the approval of the Commissioners of the District, and this bill, as advised, was drafted, prepared, and introduced at the instance of the District Commissioners.

The Comptroller of the Currency in his annual report to the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, on page 52, makes reference to this subject and calls attention of Congress to the necessity for legislation regulating banking institutions within the District of Columbia.

I request that the Clerk read from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency what is therein said on the subject now under discussion.

The Clerk read as follows:

BANKING INSTITUTIONS WITHIN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The attention of Congress is called to the necessity for legislation regulating banking institutions within the District of Columbia.

Under existing legislation only national banks, safe deposit, trust, loan, and mortgage companies, and savings banks organized under the laws of Congress, and banking institutions organized under State laws and having their principal place of business in the District, are required to make reports of their condition or are subject to any official supervision. As a matter of fact, every bank operating under a State charter within the District has, or claims to have, its "principal place of business" outside the District, and thus escapes or evades all governmental supervision and control.

Section 605, subchapter 3, of the District Code, providing for the general organization of corporations, excepts from its provisions only "banks of circulation and discount." Savings banks organized under this general act of Congress are required to make to the Comptroller of the Currency all the reports which national banking associations are required to make. The Comptroller has also power to cause examination to be made into the condition of any such savings bank, but he is without power to correct any abuse discovered, or to take any step for the protection of depositors, however unsafe he may find the condition of the bank. The power of the Comptroller is so limited as to render it practically useless.

The numerous banking institutions deriving their charters from the States have no other restrictions upon their methods of conducting business than such as may be contained in their respective charters. Many, if not all of them, are not required to make any reports of condition, are not subject to any examination, are not restricted as to reserve fund, or as to loans, or as to the amount or character of their investments.

Congress having exclusive power of legislation within the District, depositors, no doubt, assume that their interests are not left to the care of distant State legislatures. The erroneous impression is strengthened by the fact that some of the banks, not required to make any report of condition, in fact publish such reports in the same manner and at the same time as those of national banks are published according to law.

The Comptroller respectfully recommends the passage of an act requiring all banking institutions receiving deposits in the District of Columbia to make reports of their condition, to be subject to examination, and to conduct their banking business under such regulations as will afford better protection to depositors than exists under present conditions.

Mr. KLINE. My judgment is that this bill should be passed in the form in which it is now presented to the House.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to detain the House with any lengthy remarks upon this bill. I am opposed to it, however. It seems to me a left-handed way of giving a legal status to some banking institutions in this District which now do not have it. It appears from the facts at our disposal that some banking institutions organized under the laws of the several States came here and established branch banks without any authority whatever. It is true that they were not proceeded against, and they have grown to be institutions of considerable standing in the District.

As I understand it, there never was any authority for them to be here, exercising corporate authority within this District, in the manner that they have.

Now, there is no authority under Federal law for national banks to establish branch banks. This is a question that should receive the mature consideration of this House, whether or not Congress desires to approve of the policy of branch banks. Coming up as it has before this committee, without any consideration of that feature, I believe the bill ought not to pass. Indeed, the bill ought not to have gone to the District of Columbia Committee in the first instance, but should have been referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, where it belongs. Entertaining as I do these views, I shall vote against the bill, and I think it ought to fail.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL.]

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, two years ago, when the bill for appropriations for the District of Columbia was before the House, a Member who was not either a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia or the Appropriations Committee asked the question, in regard to an item, as to how that item compared with items in other cities of the same size as Washington. I was surprised at my own ignorance, being unable to answer his question. But it brought very forcibly to my mind the fact that some investigation should be made as far as that was concerned. During the following summer I collected statistics concerning the expenditures of fourteen other cities besides Washington. These statistics are arranged in tables. I had intended last winter to present the results of these investigations to the House, but unfortunately I was taken ill, and only returned on the very day on which the appropriation bill for the District was being considered.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is popularly supposed that we are living in Washington under the best possible form of municipal government, and we are very happy in that belief. I do not mean to say that we are wrong in that belief, but I think it might be well to inquire as to whether the excellence of the government is commensurate with the expense. Inasmuch as I was unable to present these tables last winter, so as to bring them as near as possible to date, I again made inquiries directed to the cities themselves, reducing the number of cities for comparison from fourteen to seven, and only including those whose population was practically the same as that in Washington.

I will for a moment take up the time of the House by reading, not the tables themselves but some of the results of the deductions from those tables. For instance, it is worthy to note that in Buffalo, a city of 27 per cent more population and 5 per cent more property than Washington, the expense for all the ordinary purposes of a city government was 32 per cent less than that of Washington. Pittsburg, with 15 per cent more population and 28 per cent more property, expended only 2 per cent more than the city of Washington for the purpose of a civil government.

Baltimore, with nearly twice the population, more than twice the property, and the victim of one of the greatest fires in the world's history, expended but 34 per cent more than the city of Washington, $2,377,686 of which being expenditure resulting from the fire. Deducting this fire expenditure the percentage for ordinary expense for Baltimore in 1904 was but 9 per cent more than that of Washington.

St. Louis, double in population and nearly double in property, expended but 18 per cent more than Washington.

These totals for ordinary expenditure for these seven cities, together with the percentages adduced, indicate an extravagance in expenditure for the city of Washington out of all proportion to the benefits derived. Had the comparison been extended to Cincinnati, Cleveland, Detroit, and other cities the comparison would have been still less in favor of Washington.

These ordinary expenditures cover salaries of city officials, clerks and laborers, expenses of the various departments of accounting, assessing, collecting and disbursing the funds; the expenses for electricity, gas, or other means of lighting; of water, excepting the original expenditure for plant; of the police, the fire, the health, charities, markets, parks, streets, and highways, including extension, sewers, garbage, ashes, schoolhouses, apparatus and school salaries, printing and binding, bridges, and all other items common to all cities for operation, protection, or education.

Taking up another table, for instance, the table of office expenditures, Washington, with a population of 74,000 less than Buffalo, expended for kindred office work $87,429 more than Buffalo. Baltimore, with 230,000 more people than Washington, expends $49,000 more than the city of Washington. Pittsburg, with 42,000 more people, expends $142,000 less money than Washington.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will allow me, when the gentleman speaks of the money expended in Washington he includes the one-half provided by the Government?

Mr. MORRELL. The total expense.

Mr. PAYNE. Including the half provided by the United States Government?

Mr. MORRELL. Yes. The entire cost, for instance, of the executive office in Washington in 1904 was $74,403. For Baltimore, $12,000; Boston, $30,000; for Buffalo, $11,000. Apparently, from these figures, the executive offices in Washington are rather, I might say, an expensive luxury.

The expense of the executive, assessors, collectors, and auditors' offices for Washington in 1904 was $181,642; for Baltimore, $74,661; for Pittsburg, $110,000; for St. Louis, $127,544; for Boston, $386,282; for Buffalo, $108,336; for Newark, $86,759. It will thus be seen that the Commissioners' office, which corresponds to the mayor's office in other cities, the collector's, the auditor's, and the assessor's offices cost very much more than all the other cities, except Boston, and more in proportion than Boston. The Washington classification has been so highly differentiated as to create unnecessary positions. No city of the same size, as far as I can gather, has half the force, and no one pays the clerks and assistants as high salaries.

Without at present going very closely into the details of these tables, I will state a few more expenses to attract, if possible, the attention of the House. Taking up the question of bridges, sewers, and street extensions, the table which I have shows that Washington expends about twice as much for street extensions and improvements as St. Louis or Boston, four times as much as Buffalo, and a hundred thousand dollars per year more than the city of Pittsburg.

Take the question of schools. It appears that the city of Cleveland, with a population of 100,000 more than Washington, employs the same number of teachers in that year—that is to say, 1,329 teachers—under a system which educators estimate to be one of the best in the United States.

To take up these tables more in detail, first, I have compared the population and valuation of seven cities in the United States for the year 1904:

City.	Population.	Percentage.	Valuation.	Percentage.
Washington	278,718	100	$237,862,660	100
St. Louis	575,298	206	439,584,490	185
Boston	560,892	203	1,206,644,267	507
Baltimore	508,857	182	503,144,182	211
Buffalo	352,887	127	249,373,000	105
Pittsburg	321,616	115	465,130,055	198
Newark, N. J	246,070	88	172,375,735	72

From this it will be seen that the population of St. Louis, Boston, Baltimore, Buffalo, and Pittsburg exceeds the population of Washington from 15 to 106 per cent, Newark, N. J., being the only city having a less population and valuation than Washington. The assessed valuations of property, both real and personal, in St. Louis, Baltimore, Boston, Buffalo, and Pittsburg exceed the valuation in Washington at from 5 to 402 per cent, the valuation of Newark being less than three-quarters of that of Washington.

City.	Gross expenditure.	Percentage.
Washington	$10,257,547	100
St. Louis	13,818,126	134
Boston	42,717,476	416
Baltimore	16,973,052	165
Buffalo	7,286,582	70
Pittsburg	10,976,044	107
Newark, N. J	6,538,939	63

GROSS EXPENDITURES NO CRITERION.

Gross expenditures include interest on debt, amount set aside for the sinking fund, amounts to meet specific loans, and other extraordinary expenses. They are therefore an unsafe basis for critical comparison. I have already called attention to the fact that it is a little singular that Buffalo, with 27 per cent more population and 5 per cent more property, should expend 30 per cent less for all purposes. Also, that Pittsburg, with a greater population and 98 per cent more property, should only expend 7 per cent more for all purposes, while Newark, with but 75 per cent of the property of Washington, has but a total expenditure of 63 per cent of that of Washington.

Washington	$9,079,908	100
St. Louis	10,734,141	118
Boston	32,638,005	359
Baltimore	12,193,118	134
Buffalo	6,176,876	68
Pittsburg	9,330,172	102
Newark, N. J	5,842,939	64

Office expenditures as here used comprehend the salaries of all executive officers, as mayor or commissioners, auditors or comptrollers, treasurers or disbursing officers, attorneys or law officers, collectors, sealers, etc., together with the clerical force provided by law. To be more explicit, I shall define office expenditure to include all the ordinary expenses of municipal government except the cost of the police force, the fire department, the lighting department, the schools, the health, charities, parks, and a few other miscellaneous expenses.

Washington	$416,867
St. Louis	741,477
Boston	740,407
Baltimore	465,870
Buffalo	329,438
Pittsburg	274,399
Newark, N. J	247,284
1902.
Cleveland	98,999
Cincinnati	176,248
Detroit	207,488
Milwaukee	212,632
San Francisco	283,000

Thus, as I have already said, Washington, with a population of 74,169 less than Buffalo, expends for kindred office work $87,429 more than Buffalo. Baltimore, with 230,139 more people than Washington, expends but $49,003 more for office work. Pittsburg, with 42,898 more people, expends $142,468 less money. Detroit and Milwaukee, with about the same population, expend about one-half the money. The same is practically true of Cleveland, Cincinnati, and San Francisco. These are all well-governed cities, and there is no satisfactory reason for an expenditure in Washington of nearly twice as much for the same services. Newark, with but 75 per cent of the population, expends 60 per cent of Washington's expenditures. Because Washington is the capital of the country is no reason for doubling, trebling, and even quadrupling the aggregates paid for the same services in cities as large and even twice as large.

The other municipalities have a single head, for whose services one of them, Chicago, with a population of 1,698,575, pays $5,000. Nearly all of the others pay from $4,000 to $6,000. Washington has a triple head, each part of which draws $5,000, with an allotment of a private secretary for each third of the authority. In other cities the chief officer is chosen by the people; has had a long residence in the city, and is identified with its material interests.

1904.
Washington	70	$818,179	$11,688
St. Louis	62	1,948,864	31,433
Boston	43	1,758,420	40,894
Baltimore	31	1,059,046	34,162
Buffalo	42	787,613	18,129
Pittsburg	28	620,000	22,143
Newark, N. J	18	509,644	28,313
1902.
Chicago	190	3,330,000	17,500
Cincinnati	37	577,607	15,600
Cleveland	33	374,000	11,300
Milwaukee	23	329,000	14,300
Philadelphia	129	2,689,915	20,700
San Francisco	41	849,248	20,700

Washington and Georgetown have an area of about 16 square miles; the remainder of the 70 square miles in the District, although under the police control of Washington, is served by a system of mounted police with beats of several square miles. The aggregate cost, $818,179, is really distributed over an area of not more than 25 square miles, and costs about $20,454 per square mile. Why police protection in Washington should cost twice as much as in Milwaukee and Cleveland and more than in Buffalo, Pittsburg, Newark, and Cincinnati is hard to understand. President Roosevelt and John C. Wilkie complimented the police force of Detroit in 1901 very highly. The police forces of any of the cities above named will compare in efficiency with the police force of Washington most favorably. Washington has 686 policemen; Baltimore, 972; Buffalo, 628; Newark (1902), 448; Cincinnati (1902), 536; Cleveland (1902), 376; Detroit (1902), 575; Milwaukee (1902), 322; Pittsburg (1902), 405.

Comparing the number of policemen in each city with its total valuation, we obtain the following interesting information: There is one policeman or police official in Washington for every $340,000 of taxable property; in Baltimore, one for every $510,000; Buffalo, one for every $397,000; Pittsburg (1902), one for $794,313; Milwaukee (1902), one for $500,000; Detroit (1902), one for $750,000; Cleveland (1902), one for $400,000; Newark (1902), one for $1,100,000.

If it be argued that the taxable property assigned to Washington is too small, being the valuation of the private property alone, it may be answered in reply that this does not materially affect the argument. The Government property is at all times under the protection of its own watch force, whose pay comes from the coffers of the National Government. If the valuation of Government buildings is to be added to one side of the account, then the expense of these extra police should be added to the other. It is evident from all these considerations that the Metropolitan police force of Washington, while a most efficient body, costs far more in proportion than other efficient bodies do in cities of the same or larger size throughout the country.

The expense account of the fire department in the city of Philadelphia—a city nearly five times as large and covering an area nearly twelve times as great as Washington proper—was $985,319. Washington expended $326,161. The following table will show the expenditures of seven cities for 1904 and five cities for 1902:

Washington	$382,217
St. Louis	829,823
Boston	1,334,382
Baltimore	615,060

Pittsburg	600,000
Newark, N. J	405,098
1902.
Cleveland	412,999
Cincinnati	471,373
Detroit	465,932
Milwaukee	421,333
San Francisco	703,264

Next comes streets and highways. This table shows the comparative expense in cities for extension and improvement of streets, avenues, and alleys, excluding lighting, cleaning, sewerage, parks, and bridges, 1904.

EXTENSION AND IMPROVEMENT OF STREETS.

City.	Extension.	Improvement.	Total.
Washington	$199,504	$583,723	$783,207
St. Louis	89,138	219,443	308,581

Buffalo	18,095	175,468	193,563
Pittsburg	Can not separate.		678,000
Newark, N. J

STREET CLEANING.

City.	Ashes and garbage.	Cleaning.	Total.
Washington	$133,387	$186,290	$299,677
St. Louis	322,562	704,569	1,027,131
Boston	706,529	434,132	1,140,651

Buffalo	160,000	140,000	300,000
Pittsburg[a]

[a] The item in the preceding table covers all expense.

STREET REPAIRING AND LIGHTING.

City.	Repairing.	Lighting.	Total.
Washington	$293,427	$288,923	$582,350
St. Louis	605,169	566,715	1,171,884
Boston	1,073,445		1,073,445
Baltimore	180,510	320,121	500,632
Buffalo	50,632	303,391	354,023
Pittsburg	150,000	387,859	537,859
Newark, N. J	167,917	240,694	408,611

BRIDGES AND SEWERS.

City.	Bridges.	Sewers.	Total.
Washington	$61,777	$678,190	$739,967
St. Louis	131,710	255,560	385,270
Boston	459,658	324,360	784,018
Baltimore	44,303	97,906	138,209
Buffalo	369,862		369,862
Pittsburg	31,050	(a)	31,050

It will be seen from these tables that, as I have said, Washington expends about twice as much for street extension and improvement as St. Louis and Boston, four times as much as Buffalo, and $100,000 per year more than Pittsburg. The destructive fire at Baltimore cast such an amount of extra work upon that city as to make its expenditures for the year 1904 of no value in this comparison. Were less money spent upon street extension and improvement and more upon garbage and cleaning, a better equilibrium would be maintained.

The amount expended for sewerage seems to be very high when compared with that of St. Louis, Baltimore, and Buffalo.

Next I have a table of public schools. This table includes the expenditure for all schools—collegiate, business, art, kindergarten, normal, summer, and public—including salaries, books, fuel, buildings, grounds, and other contingencies, 1904 and 1902:

Washington	$1,068,986	$621,385	$1,690,371
St. Louis[a]
Boston	2,631,358	3,106,876	5,738,234
Baltimore	1,169,147	270,897	1,440,044
Buffalo	1,081,650	97,021	1,178,671
Pittsburg	Both items included.		1,075,000
Cincinnati	1,092,689	61,612	1,154,301
Cleveland	1,491,104	922,444	2,413,548
Detroit	763,002	334,829	1,097,031

[a] Comptroller's report does not itemize.

Enrollment, number of teachers, and cost per pupil, based on total enrollment and total expenditure, 1903.

City.	Enrolled.	Teachers.	Cost per pupil.

St. Louis	82,459	1,669	27.40

One of the best systems of schools in the United States is that of Cleveland, Ohio. The figures upon which the above calculations were made were taken from the Report of the Commissioner of Education for 1903. It appears that the city of Cleveland, with a population of 100,000 more than Washington, employed the same number of teachers in that year. That is to say, 1,339 teachers in Cleveland, Ohio, under a system which educators admit to be one of the best in the United States, educated an enrolled population of 64,884, at a cost of $33.80 each, while the same number of teachers in Washington educated 16,000 less, at a cost of only 50 cents less per capita. It will also be seen that the per capita cost for the education of a child in Philadelphia, under a system admittedly the best, is $7.80 less than in Washington. The per capita cost of education in all the cities named, except Cleveland and Boston, is far below that of Washington. Newark and Cincinnati enroll almost as many pupils and educates them at a cost of from $10 to $12 less per capita. Buffalo educates 25 per cent more children than Washington, in schools equally as good or better, at $9 less per capita. The fault of the Washington system lies first in its so-called "board of education." It is nonrepresentative as to residence, educational ability, and knowledge of educational affairs. The system is without a head, as the superintendent is divested of that part of the authority which goes to make efficiency in public instruction. He has no absolute control over principals or teachers. The principals lack subordination, as do the teachers. The pay of both teachers and principals is representative of the pay of teachers and principals in good schools throughout the country. The above figures demonstrate this conclusion.

The last table refers to charities and corrections for the year 1903:

City.	Charities.	Corrections.	Total.

Mr. Speaker, this concludes the tables. I may add that it was in the course of this investigation that the matter of street extension was brought to my attention, as also several other matters in connection with the District of Columbia—for instance, taxation. I propose at some future occasion to burden the House with some remarks upon these other matters, and I do hope that the Members of the House will give attention to these tables when they appear in the RECORD and will scrutinize them carefully.

I ask it for this reason, because, as far as the expenditures of the District of Columbia is concerned, the Members of this House occupy a dual position of trust. First, they come here representing their constituents at home, a portion of whose taxes are used to pay for the government of the city; next, they represent also almost 400,000 of population of the city of Washington, who are deprived of suffrage and who have no means of regulating the expenditure of the money they pay in taxes. I trust for these reasons that the Members of the House will give these matters their careful attention.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "companies," insert the words "or trust companies."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 12320) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. TELLER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the following bills:

S. 1098. An act granting an increase of pension to William J. Grow; and

S. 943. An act granting an increase of pension to Oscar R. Arnold.

EXTENSION OF RHODE ISLAND AVENUE NE.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 56) authorizing the extension of Rhode Island avenue NE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin calls up the bill (S. 56) authorizing the extension of Rhode Island avenue NE., and asks that it be taken from the Speaker's table and a similar House bill, which has been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia and is on the Union Calendar, which the gentleman states should not be there, be put on the House Calendar. The Chair will state that he has not examined the bill. The gentleman from Wisconsin is familiar with it. What statement has the gentleman to make about it?

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I would say that the bill carries no appropriation whatever from the General Government, and the expenses brought under the bill are paid by the abutting property owners. It is a street-opening bill.

The SPEAKER. And makes no charge upon the General Treasury?

Mr. BABCOCK. No.

The SPEAKER. Then the bill will be stricken from the Union Calendar and placed on the House Calendar. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed, within ninety days from the approval of this act, to institute proceedings to condemn the land necessary for the extension of Rhode Island avenue from Lincoln road to Fourth street east, with a width of 130 feet.

SEC. 2. That all of the amount found to be due and awarded as damages for and in respect of the land condemned for the extension of Rhode Island avenue, as herein provided, shall be assessed by the jury hereinafter provided for as benefits, and to the extent of such benefits against those pieces or parcels of land on each side of said avenue as extended, and also on any or all pieces or parcels of land which will be benefited by the extension of said avenue, as said jury may find said pieces or parcels of land will be benefited, and in determining the amounts to be assessed against said pieces or parcels of land the jury shall take into consideration the respective situations of such pieces or parcels of land and the benefits they may severally receive from the extension of said avenue as aforesaid.

SEC. 3. That the said court shall cause public notice of not less than ten days to be given of the filing of said proceedings, by advertisement in such manner as the court shall prescribe, which notice shall warn all persons having any interest in the proceedings to attend court at a day to be named in said notice, and to continue in attendance until the court shall have made its final order ratifying and confirming the award of damages and assessment of benefits of the jury; and in addition to such public notice said court, whenever in its judgment it is practicable to do so, may cause a copy of said notice to be served by the marshal of the District of Columbia, or his deputies, upon such owners of the land to be condemned as may be found by said marshal, or his deputies, within the District of Columbia.

SEC. 4. That after the return of the marshal and the filing of proof of publication of the notice provided for in the preceding section, said court shall cause a jury of seven judicious, disinterested men, not related to any person interested in the proceedings, and not in the service or employment of the District of Columbia or of the United States, to be summoned by the marshal of the District of Columbia, to which jurors said court shall administer an oath or affirmation that they are not interested in any manner in the land to be condemned, nor are they in any way related to the parties interested therein, and that they will, without favor or partiality, to the best of their judgment, assess the damages each owner of land taken may sustain by reason of the extension of said avenue and the condemnation of lands for the purpose of such extension, and assess the benefits resulting therefrom as hereinbefore provided. The court before accepting the jury shall hear any objections that may be made to any member thereof, and shall have full power to decide upon all such objections, and to excuse any juror or cause any vacancy in the jury; when impaneled, to be filled, and after said jury shall have been organized and shall have viewed the premises said jury shall proceed, in the presence of the court, if the court shall so direct, or otherwise, as the court may direct, to hear and receive such evidence as may be offered or submitted on behalf of the District of Columbia and by any person or persons having interest in the proceedings for the extension of said avenue. When the hearing is concluded, the jury, or a majority of them, shall return to said court, in writing, its verdict of the amount to be found due and payable as damages sustained by reason of the extension of said avenue under the provisions hereof, and of the pieces or parcels of land benefited by such extension, and the amount of the assessment for such benefits against the same.

SEC. 5. That if the use of a part only of any piece or parcel of ground shall be condemned, the jury, in determining its value, shall not take into consideration any benefits that may accrue to the remainder thereof from the extension of said avenue or highway, but such benefits shall be considered in determining what assessment shall be made on or against such part of such piece or parcel of land as may not be taken as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 6. That the court shall have power to hear and determine any objections which may be filed to said verdict or award, and to set aside and vacate the same, in whole or in part, when satisfied that it is unjust or unreasonable, and in such event a new jury shall be summoned, who shall proceed to assess the damages or benefits, as the case may be, in respect of the land as to which the verdict may be vacated, as in the case of the first jury: Provided, That if vacated in part, the residue of the verdict and award as to the land condemned or assessed shall not be affected thereby: And provided further, That the exceptions or objections to the verdict and award shall be filed within thirty days after the return of such verdict and award.

SEC. 7. That when the verdict of said jury shall have been finally ratified and confirmed by the court, as herein provided, the amounts of money awarded and adjudged to be payable for lands taken under the provisions hereof shall be paid to the owners of said land by the disbursing officer of the District of Columbia from moneys advanced to him by the Secretary of the Treasury upon requisitions of the Commissioners of said District, as provided by law; and a sufficient sum to pay the amounts of said judgments and awards is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 8. That when confirmed by the court the several assessments herein provided to be made shall severally be a lien upon the land assessed, and shall be collected as special improvement taxes in the District of Columbia, and shall be payable in five equal annual installments, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum from and after sixty days after the confirmation of the verdict and award. In all cases of payments the accounting officers shall take into account the assessments for benefits and the award for damages, and shall pay only such part of said award in respect of any lot as may be in excess of the assessment for benefits against the part of such lot not taken, and there shall be credited on said assessment the amount of said award not in excess of said assessment. That said court may allow amendments in form or substance in any petition, process, record, or proceeding, or in the description of property proposed to be taken, or of property assessed for benefits, whenever such amendments will not interfere with the substantial rights of the parties interested.

SEC. 9. That each juror shall receive as compensation the sum of $5 per day for his services during the time he shall be actually engaged in such services under the provisions hereof.

SEC. 10. That the sum of $300 is hereby appropriated, out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, to provide the necessary funds for the costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto.

SEC. 11. That no appeal by any interested party from the decision of the supreme court of the District of Columbia confirming the assessment or assessments of benefits or damages herein provided for nor any other proceeding at law or in equity by such party against the confirmation of such assessment or assessments shall delay or prevent the payment of award to others in respect to the property condemned, nor delay or prevent the taking of any of said property sought to be condemned, nor the extension of such avenue: Provided, however, That upon the final determination of said appeal or other proceeding at law or in equity the amount found to be due and payable as damages sustained by reason of the extension of said avenue under the provisions hereof shall be paid as hereinbefore provided.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the similar House bill on the House Calendar will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the votes by which the several bills reported from the District of Columbia and passed be reconsidered and that that motion lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PUNISHMENT FOR WIFE BEATING.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8133) to provide for the infliction of corporal punishment upon all male persons convicted of willfully beating their wives, and the manner and place of inflicting the said punishment, and the officers by whom the same is to be inflicted, which I send to the desk and ask to have read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever hereafter any male person in the District of Columbia shall beat, bruise, or mutilate his wife, the court before whom such offender shall be tried and convicted shall direct the infliction of corporal punishment upon such offender, to be laid upon his bare back to the number of lashes not exceeding thirty, by means of a whip or lash of suitable proportions and strength for the purpose of this act.

SEC. 2. That the punishment provided in the first section of this act shall be inflicted by the marshal of the District of Columbia, or by one of his deputies, within the prison inclosure, and in the presence of a duly licensed physician or surgeon and of the keeper of the said prison or one of his deputies, but in the presence of no other person.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say just a word in respect to this bill. This bill has been considered by the Committee on the District of Columbia, and the committee has agreed upon a unanimous report, and that is to report the same to the House without recommendation.

Mr. SIMS. Not a unanimous report.

Mr. BABCOCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. SIMS. There were three votes against it on the roll calls in the committee.

Mr. BABCOCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I understood the three votes were against the bill and not against reporting it to the House without recommendation.

Mr. SIMS. That would not be a unanimous report, would it?

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS].

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BABCOCK. Such time as the gentleman desires.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I would like to know whether time will be granted to the opposition and whether somebody will be designated to have control of the time in opposition to the bill?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for recognition, and then I shall yield to the opposition.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to have the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] present his views on this question, but I do not think the time of the House ought to be occupied a great while with it. If the gentleman will consent to divide the time of discussion between himself and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT], and not take over an hour, I shall not object to it. Then I think the House ought to have a chance to vote on the question of whether the bill ought to be laid on the table or not.

Mr. MAHON. Well, Mr. Speaker, we desire to offer some amendments.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I will say that the time of the House is too valuable for some of the amendments I have heard of. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I will be willing to yield half of my time to those in opposition, if that is satisfactory.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the committee and I opposed this bill, and I desire to be recognized in opposition to the measure.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, suppose the arrangement be that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] yield half his time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], a member of the committee, who is opposed to the bill?

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, I am entitled to one hour.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield one-half hour to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] and one-half hour to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], a member of the committee, in opposition to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] is recognized.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, just a moment. Does the gentleman think this bill should not be discussed longer than an hour? It is a new matter.

Mr. BABCOCK. The hour is all the time I have.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do you not think we ought to take more time? I suggest that to the gentleman.

Mr. PAYNE. That will be for the House to arrange afterwards.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then why limit it now?

Mr. PAYNE. It is not being limited now; it is simply distributing the hour, and afterwards it will be for the House to say whether they want to hear discussion longer.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask the serious——

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MAHON. I wish to offer the following amendment after the gentleman is through with his general statement.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order for the gentleman to offer an amendment at this time.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I have the floor, and I do not yield.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MAHON. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not interpose, the Chair takes it, even for a parliamentary inquiry while another gentleman has the floor.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I will make it in the future.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask serious consideration of this House for a few moments only to a subject which, while some are inclined to treat with levity, was considered of sufficient importance to be recommended by the President, who said in his message to the Fifty-eighth Congress, page 13:

> There are certain offenders, whose criminality takes the shape of brutality and cruelty toward the weak, who need a special type of punishment. The wife beater, for example, is inadequately punished by imprisonment, for imprisonment may often mean nothing to him, while it may cause hunger and want to the wife and children who have been the victims of his brutality. Probably some form of corporal punishment would be the most adequate way of meeting this kind of crime.

Which has been unanimously indorsed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, to whom, under the practice of the committee having charge, matters relating to the District are referred for their consideration.

They sent the following letter to the chairman:

> OFFICE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
> Washington, January 3, 1906.
> SIR: The Commissioners recommend favorable action upon H. R. bill 8133, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, "To provide for the infliction of corporal punishment upon all male persons convicted of willfully beating their wives, and the manner and place of inflicting the said punishment, and the officers by whom the same is to be inflicted," which was referred to them at your instance for their views thereon, and invite particular attention to the fitness of retaining the provision that the punishment is to be administered in private.
> Very respectfully,
> HENRY B. F. MACFARLAND, > President Board of Commissioners District of Columbia.
> Hon. J. W. BABCOCK,
> Chairman Committee on District of Columbia,
> House of Representatives.

More than that, it has the entire support of one of the ablest chiefs of police who exists in this country, who stands so high in his profession that he is at the head of the organization of that body throughout the United States. Not only does he give his unequivocal support to this measure, but he furnishes statistics that will perhaps surprise the Members of this House who have not had their attention called to the fact that within the last two years there have been 508 cases of wife beating in the District of Columbia, and we know this is not a very large city.

> HEADQUARTERS METROPOLITAN POLICE DEPARTMENT > OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
> MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a memorandum showing the number of cases of arrest in this jurisdiction where the charge was assault or assault and battery on women. The statistics are based on the records where the wife, or person of the same name as the defendant, was the complaining witness, as under existing law the charge is one of assault. Many of these cases were dismissed or nolle prosequied upon the request of the prosecuting witnesses.
> If you will pardon the suggestion, I believe it would add to the completeness of your bill if you would include among those whom it would make subject to the penalty to be imposed the individuals who assault common-law wives or other females, as numerous instances of the kind have been recorded.
> In my annual reports to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia I have heretofore expressed a favorable opinion for such a measure as you propose.
> With best wishes, permit me to be,
> Very truly,

The number of arrests on the charge of assaulting wives during the past two years was:

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think it is time to put levity aside and to listen to whatever may be submitted in the way of argument in support of this legislation. It is a curious thing, but the people who have looked into this question—the people who have made a study of this question and those who have been called——

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I decline to yield until I am through, then I will answer all questions—that those who have been thrown in relation to this crime, such as judges, magistrates, police—those to whom this revolting habit has been brought under their notice—are all in favor of this legislation, while those who pretend to cast it aside with flippancy and caricature and that maudlin sentiment that makes people send flowers to the cell of the condemned murderer, forgetting the victim, who lies in the cold ground, those people are opposed to this legislation.

I cite a few whose judgment should have weight on this question:

In 1874 the home office of England issued a circular requesting opinions whether flogging should be authorized in cases of assault, especially on women and children. There was a great unanimity of opinion that the law as it stood was insufficient, and that the penalty of flogging should be added to the list of sanctions. Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, Justices Blackburn, Meller, Lush, Quain, Archibald, Brett, Grove, Lord Chief Baron Kelly, and Barons Bramwell, Piggott, Pollock, Cleasby, and Amphlet were all of this opinion. Lord Coleridge and Mr. Justice Denman were hesitating, and Mr. Justice Keating, of all who sat upon the bench, was the only opponent of flogging.

The chairman and magistrates in sessions were, in sixty-four cases out of sixty-eight, in favor of whipping. The recorders of forty-one towns were likewise in favor of it, only three entering their protest against it. When, at the session of the legislature of Pennsylvania, a bill to establish the whipping post for wife beaters was introduced in the senate by the speaker he was flooded with letters from within and without the State in support of the bill, and copies thereof asked for even from Canada. The proposed act received the almost unanimous support of the public press. In the interrogatories sent to the several district attorneys the direct question of their opinion as to the establishment of the whipping post as a punishment was not asked for two reasons: First, in the agricultural counties the crime exists to a slight extent only, and the attorneys, probably in ignorance of its prevalence elsewhere, would naturally see no necessity for it; in the second place, the reasons for imposing whipping as a punishment solely for the crime of wife beating have but recently been given to the public. The following voluntary remarks, therefore, have double force as spontaneous opinions of the public prosecutors. The district attorney of Schuylkill County says:

> There is a growing sentiment in this county in favor of your bill. Our judge has spoken favorably of it, and reminded a defendant, as he was about to sentence him, that he hoped the day was not distant when wife beaters would be punished as directed in your bill.

The district attorney of Westmoreland County adds:

> As a rule, the same parties, in a year or so, turn up in court again for the same offense. The whipping post is the only adequate punishment for the offense.

The district attorney for Cameron County testifies:

> The law in its present condition is utterly powerless to prevent this crime. Summary conviction before a magistrate and the whipping post within an hour after the crime would, in my opinion, be a good way to prevent its recurrence.

The district attorney of Adams County puts a postscript:

> Your proposed correction of this evil, when the case is clearly established, meets with my hearty approval.

Forest County:

> A law to flog wife beaters would be good.

The judgment of the district attorney of Bradford is:

> We ought to have the old whipping post in Pennsylvania, and nothing else will so effectually check this most dastardly crime.

The district attorney of Franklin writes:

> I heartily favor the whipping post.

Clearfield County, represented by district attorney, says:

> In the writer's opinion, the Delaware whipping post would be a salutary preventive for this crime.

The opinion of the experienced district attorney of Philadelphia, who presented 308 bills to the grand jury and convicted 80 brutes of this cowardly crime, is:

> In my judgment the reestablishment of the whipping post or some mode of corporal punishment, inflicted privately, would be more effective to reduce the number of wife beaters than the punishment of incarceration.

Three grand juries of Philadelphia County recommended the passage of this bill to the legislature, and four called the attention of the public to the prevalence of the crime. The opinions of the judges of the court of common pleas of the State, on the advisability of whipping as a remedy for wife beating, are generally unknown to the speaker, but the mature judgment of the two judges longest in service on the Philadelphia bench—Judge Allison and Judge Ludlow (his junior but a few years)—both favored the proposed punishment.

In 1883 the legislature of Maryland passed a bill to punish wife beaters by whipping them, and the district attorney of Baltimore informed the speaker that after the first conviction the crime ceased as if by magic in that State.

Mr. Speaker, there are sound economic reasons for the passage of this proposed measure. Society is organized for self-protection. We institute police courts and prisons for the protection of the weaker combined against the brutal. We are taxed, and in some instances taxed heavily, to support an expensive police and legal operation and the maintenance of jails, and for the thief and for the murderer the taxpayer gets some return. His property is that much safer and his person is more secure. But what relation has this brute to the taxpayer? What heeds it to any one of us whether he plies his brutal vocation daily except the instinct of humanity that arouses our better sentiments. It affects the citizen in no degree if he plies his vocation every day, and yet what is the practical result? Under the present law he is arrested and——

Mr. WACHTER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I decline to yield, and I request the House not to interrupt me until I get through, when I will answer all questions—and goes through all the expense of a trial and incarceration in jail and we are taxed to support him during his punishment. Does it end there? No; because the class of people who indulge in such brutal customs generally are without means, and before the end of the term of his imprisonment his family and children are sent to the almshouse and again we are taxed to support this man's family and himself in jail for which we get no return whatever. That in no degree affects the safety of our person or the safety of our property.

This is surely a sound argument, and one that can be met by the fact that the students of penology are of one accord that there is something in the low instinct of the man who would inflict pain on something weaker than himself, be it the animal creation or be it the one whom he has sworn to cherish and support—that there is a peculiar trait in the mental capacity of such a one that the punishment he dreads more than any other is that of the infliction of corporal punishment on himself. I do not wish to weary the House with all the facts that I have gathered on this subject, for it has been a study with me for many years. There sits not one within the sound of my voice who, when this question was first submitted to me, treated it more lightly or was more opposed to it as it appealed to his judgment. But it was my duty as a legislator in the senate of Pennsylvania to take charge of the bill that my constituents put into my hands, and in fulfilling my duty I became more than convinced that the legislation was wise and founded on argument that to my mind, in the course of time, became unanswerable. I gathered statistics in the State of Pennsylvania, and there, I regret to say, the terrible showing was made of 500 wife beatings in that civilized State in one year.

County.	During the last year how many complaints were made to the grand jury for wife beating or for assault and battery on wives by their husbands?	How many true bills were found?	How many convictions were obtained, and what was the average term of sentence?	The nationality of the condemned.	In your opinion, is the crime on the increase?	Do you know if the families of the condemned or what part of them became a charge on the county for want of support?	Were the condemned under the influence of liquor at the time of committing the crime?

Five hundred and twenty-five brutal complaints by wives against their husbands for brutal beatings in one year is a terrible showing for a State so long settled and so far advanced in civilization in other respects as is Pennsylvania. Three hundred and thirty-seven of the complaints were pronounced well founded by the grand jury, and 211 husbands were convicted for terms averaging three months each, thus depriving their families of necessary support. Would that we could flatter ourselves that these returns showed the full extent of this crime in that Commonwealth, but it is probably ten times as great as is directly apparent. It will be noticed that there is no return from the coal regions of Luzerne County. Attention is also called to the prevalence of wife beating in Camden, N. J., which, except for geographical lines, is part of Philadelphia. The tabulated reports represent only the aggravated assaults, in which the wife, driven to desperation by repeated assaults, seeks to have her husband imprisoned.

Hundreds of minor cases appear before the justices of the peace or are settled before trial. This fact is established by the voluntary remarks of the several district attorneys. He of Lycoming County says:

> The statement does not by any means represent the extent of the crime. Many prosecutions are settled before the justices that we never hear of. Many more wives are abused who will not make a complaint.

The prosecutor of Northampton County says:

> There probably have been many more such cases returned for trial during the year, but settled by parties before bill is found. Many more have been settled by the justices of the peace and no returns made to court.

Blair County:

> I have had a great many cases of wife beating, but only some three or four have come to trial; all generally settled, and frequently before preliminary hearing.

Montgomery County:

> Desertion cases, which are disposed of on hearing without jury trial, develop a large amount of wife beating. These are not included in the queries. During the past year wife beating was developed in ten desertion cases.

The district attorney of Erie County says:

> I find that a certain class of Englishmen beat their wives from habit.

Dauphin County:

> Only two specific charges of assault and battery on wives, but in many desertion or maintenance cases the testimony showed personal violence by husbands.

Clearfield County reports:

> Forty complaints have been made before magistrates in addition to complaints appearing in court.

In the thickly settled mining regions of Schuykill County the preserver of the peace writes:

> Thirty-six cases were returned by justices of the peace and were bound over by the judges for good behavior. Then we had about forty cases in which there was no trial from the fact that the wives asked the court to withdraw the prosecution of the defendant, as his imprisonment would leave the families in want.

It is needless, in order to establish the prevalence of this crime, to quote from others who write in a similar strain.

Further, it will be noticed that wife beating exists to a greater extent, though not exclusively, among the foreign population, and it is certainly desirable that the baneful influence of the practice should be promptly checked before contaminating our native-born people.

To the question, "Were the condemned under the influence of liquor at the time of committing the crime?" the answer is almost invariably in the affirmative. Here is a thought for those interested in the temperance cause. What effect would the whipping post have on these drunken brutes? From eleven counties and from Camden comes the disheartening statement that in the opinion of the men best able to judge the crime is on the increase.

Surely, with its prevalence in many counties and its increase in others, the present law is proved to be inadequate, and legislation is necessary on the subject.

The knowledge of the frequency of wife beating will be startling to the community and the inadequacy of the present punishment evident. Infliction of punishment should always have a twofold end—the reform of the criminal and the prevention of the committing of the crime by others. Hobbes says:

> In revenges or punishments man ought not to look at the greatness of the evil past, but the greatness of the good to follow, whereby we are forbidden to inflict punishment with any other design than for the conviction of the offender and the admonition of others.

The latter has the greatest interest for the public for its own safety and that of its property.

The ordinary procedure, when complaint is made, is before justices of the peace, to whom the wife applies to have her husband bound over to keep the peace or to provide maintenance. These cases are usually settled, the wife preferring to risk a second beating rather than deprive herself and offspring of food and shelter. The risk of such deprivation likewise deters the magistrate. The district attorney of Cameron County writes:

> The greatest difficulty in enforcing the law properly and punishing wife beaters arises from the fact that the wives themselves in every instance come into court and beg their husbands' release. This has been my experience and my predecessor says his was the same. Summary conviction before a magistrate and the whipping post within an hour after the crime would, in my opinion, be a good way to prevent the constant occurrence of this crime.

The district attorney of Schuylkill County says:

> There were about forty cases in which there was no trial, from the fact that the wives asked the court to withdraw the prosecution. To imprison the defendants would only leave their families in want.

The district attorney of Lycoming County testifies:

> Except in aggravated cases settlement is encouraged, because the parties are all poor and have no money for the costs and fines, and their families suffer while they are in prison.

The district attorney of Pittsburg writes:

> In most cases the wives come into court and beg for the release of their husbands.

The district attorney of Philadelphia says:

> I have no doubt the imprisonment of the wife beater in a large majority of cases causes very great suffering to the innocent families—more, indeed, than his incarceration inflicts on him.

In the more formal and protracted procedure of complaint and indictment by the grand jury, followed by trial in court, the objections noted rise to even a greater degree of force, and Judge Mitchell, of Philadelphia, informed me that in cases in which conviction has been had he has invariably been appealed to by the wife to impose only a short sentence, as long imprisonment meant starvation to the family of the convicted.

Confinement in the county jail, where not even hard labor is imposed, has no terror for a brute so demoralized that he will strike a woman—his physical inferior—and by nature he is incapable of feeling for those suffering at home.

It has been urged that wives would not inform on their husbands and expose them to the disgrace of being whipped. But at least they would have a chance, and it will be seen from the testimony given that the law as at present existent does not even give them any option, for with the want of food staring them in the face they dare not complain. The punishment of the lash is not open to the objection that want will follow to the complainants, and if they have a remedy and prefer to suffer, it is for them to decide. Wife beating is not done openly where the law can see and take cognizance of the breach of the peace, and that the law may be put in motion it is essential that the wife should be placed in an untrammeled position, free to protect herself by making complaint.

But more than that, Mr. Speaker; there was a general idea that the lash does not prevail as a punishment. There is a maudlin sentiment going around that this—the infliction of the lash—is a step back to barbarism. Why, I heard a Member of this House say but a few moments ago that he hoped he never would be elected to an office by the people so long as he lived if he ever consented to such a punishment as this. Why, that man is ennobling the culprit and forgetting the woman. He would spare the back of the wife beater, but forget the woman who is beaten.

One of the papers stated that the erection of the whipping post would be a disgrace to this capital. Why, Mr. Speaker, the disgrace to this capital is that the chief of police reports 508 wife beatings in the last two years; and, I take it, it will be to the honor of this capital if this body, responsible for the conduct of the inhabitants of the capital of our country, will institute a course of punishment which will cause it to go out to the world that the American people will not tolerate 500 brutes in the capital of the country who beat their wives.

Mr. Speaker, there has been legislation passed on this subject in some of the States in the Union. I wish it distinctly understood that I do not stand for the whipping post in Delaware as it exists, barring the statute for wife beating. I believe public whipping is degrading. I believe it has a bad effect and a demoralizing effect on the people. It has been stated in the public prints that there is no statute in Delaware against wife beating. That is not correct. It was passed expressly to cure this evil, and had no relation to the old-time statute against petty thievery, and so on. I have a letter from the district attorney of Delaware in which he states that this law has been most efficacious. So, too, in Maryland, where the law exists, it has been deterrent in its influence. Since this agitation started more widely two years ago, owing to attention being recalled to it by the President of the United States, a law has been passed in Oregon, and after three convictions the crime has almost disappeared.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I decline to yield.

If these are not serious reasons, I would like to submit to the House some further evidence in this regard. It has been urged that wives will not inform on their husbands. Since this question has been under agitation I have made some clippings from the newspapers. There was a man, an ex-policeman of this city, who was arrested for beating his wife in the most inhuman manner. He was brought before the magistrate, and the magistrate who tried the case said he regretted he had not a post to send him to; so the present law was put into effect and the man was sent to jail. A few days afterwards I got another clipping from the paper relating to this case, and the subject-matter of it was this: The wife goes to the magistrate and asks him that her husband be released. Why; because he did not deserve it? No. Because she has forgiven him? No. Why, then? Because she and her children were starving. That is the present law. You punish the innocent wife and children and feed and house the man who beats her. If there is a man here that that argument does not appeal to, he must be like Pharaoh and has hardened his heart.

Mr. Speaker, under this law the wives will have an opportunity to complain. That is all that the law does. If a man picks your pocket in the street and you do not choose to prosecute him, the law is futile. Put it into the power of the defenseless wife, who is not beaten in the highway, who has not police protection. He does not have even the courage of the highwayman, who attacks openly and brutally uses force. It is done in what ought to be the sanctity of home, where the screams of his wife can not be heard and where police protection does not reach her; therefore the crime should receive that punishment which fits the crime.

There is another question that might interest some Members of this House. It is an admitted fact that many of these beatings are not the natural instinct of the man, but that he has been inflamed and is under the influence of liquor. Here is a thought for the temperance people. It is a demoralizing crime, and if a man knows it will lead to brutality, which will end in the lash of the whip, he may hesitate to take the final drink that will give him the great bravery to go home and attack his defenseless wife.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will close for a few minutes, reserving the balance of my time. Before I do so, I wish to state that the result of this legislation where it exists has been most efficient. In Maryland this crime has been very much reduced. In Delaware they have a law where the reports show that it has been reduced where they have a whipping post.

Mr. WACHTER. The gentleman has told the House that the whipping post has been used efficiently in Maryland. Where does he get his figures?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I got my information from the prosecuting attorney.

Mr. WACHTER. Which one?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Not the present one.

Mr. WACHTER. One of fifty years ago?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think that it would be equally valuable now?

Mr. WACHTER. I want to say to the gentleman, for his information, that we have a whipping post in Baltimore city jail that we would like to sell to the District of Columbia. [Laughter.] Our law is still in existence, but there have been only two men whipped in all that time. There have been none whipped in the last ten years. I wish the gentleman to know that we have a whipping post for sale.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman a question in return. I am told that under the law of Maryland there are two courses that prevail as to the punishment. If the whipping has been very brutal, he is whipped; most of these cowards have pleaded guilty of the simpler offense.

Mr. WACHTER. I will state to the gentleman Maryland always assumes her responsibility. The women do not want it used any more than the men.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Where do you get your information?

Mr. WACHTER. Right at home [great laughter]—I mean, in Baltimore. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the gentleman, referring now to his bill, which he has introduced, wherein it says that the number of lashes given shall not exceed thirty. Would not the law, if this were enacted, leave it in the discretion of the person inflicting the punishment, rather than the court, to say how many lashes shall be given?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. It would be in the discretion of the judge.

Mr. NORRIS. The law does not give the judge any discretion to say how many lashes shall be received. The sentence would be "not to exceed thirty." Now, who would be the man who would determine that?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. The judge has discretion in inflicting punishment to say what the term of imprisonment shall be.

Mr. NORRIS. No; the judgment of the court would be that he be punished. It seems to me, considering it seriously, which I am, that if there is such a law enacted there ought to be an amendment providing that the court shall determine how many lashes shall be given.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I would be glad to accept an amendment to that effect.

Mr. JAMES. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JAMES. I see that you say in your bill that this whipping shall be within the prison inclosure.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. JAMES. I have heard with a great deal of interest your argument as to why this legislation should be enacted. Would you object to an amendment striking out those words and inserting in lieu therof, "in front of the Peace Monument, Pennsylvania avenue." [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I am perfectly willing to extend courtesy to any gentleman who wishes to produce an effective measure, but I am not prepared to reply to anybody who is inclined to treat the subject with levity.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. I am treating with great seriousness the gentleman's bill.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I only wish to say that I shall be glad to listen to any proposition concerning this bill which is serious, but I am not inclined——

Mr. JAMES. I understand the gentleman to say——

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I decline to yield further.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania declines to yield further to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. WACHTER] says they have in their State of Maryland a whipping-post law, and that they are ready over there to sell the whipping post. He does not say they are willing to repeal the law, or that they have repealed it. He says they have not whipped a man over there in ten years, but he does not tell you that there have been any wives beaten. In other words, the law has suppressed the evil; and yet he stands opposed to the law. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I asked the gentleman from Maryland where he got his information, and he hadn't any, and sat down.

Mr. WACHTER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I am ready to tell the gentleman all about it.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I will ask to have my attention called when I have used ten minutes, as I wish to yield some of my time to others.

Mr. Speaker, it would not be courteous to treat this matter or the gentleman from Pennsylvania other than seriously, because he has taken himself seriously and he is seriously in favor of this bill, and therefore as a courtesy to him I will treat the matter seriously; but if a vote were taken now I do not believe there would be more than one vote in this House in favor of this bill.

But I want to show how strongly this legislation has been recommended. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says the President of the United States recommended it a year ago. Well, he is a year older now, and in his recent message he did not recommend it. But let us see what the President did say before we charge him up with so grave a thing as recommending the restoration of the whipping post in the capital of the United States in the year 1906, in opposition to public opinion, to higher civilization, to every Christian church in the United States that I know of, and everybody else except the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who, I understand, has spent several years in trying to impress the legislature of his own State with the necessity of such a law for Philadelphia and other cities in Pennsylvania, but who has so far been utterly unable to convert anybody in the legislature of his own State.

Let us see what the President says. He says:

> There are certain offenders, whose criminality takes the shape of brutality and cruelty toward the weak, who need a special type of punishment. The wife beater, for example, is inadequately punished by imprisonment, for imprisonment may often mean nothing to him, while it may cause hunger and want to the wife and children who have been the victims of his brutality.

Now, here comes the recommendation:

> Probably some form of corporal punishment would be the most adequate way of meeting this kind of crime.

The whipping post is not mentioned, whipping is not mentioned, and it is only said that probably some form of physical punishment would meet the case. Now, that is the "strong recommendation" of the President of the United States twelve months ago last December, which he has not thought worthy of repetition in his recent message.

Now, let us see what the chief of police says in writing to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He says:

> MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a memorandum showing the number of cases of arrest in this jurisdiction where the charge was assault or assault and battery on women. The statistics are based on the records where the wife, or person of the same name as the defendant, was the complaining witness, as under existing law the charge is one of assault. Many of these cases were dismissed or nolle prosequied upon the request of the prosecuting witnesses.

Now, here is the suggestion of the chief of police:

> If you will pardon the suggestion, I believe it would add to the completeness of your bill if you would include among those whom it would make subject to the penalty to be imposed the individuals who assault common-law wives or other females, as numerous instances of the kind have been recorded.

Why did not the gentleman from Pennsylvania accept the suggestion of the chief of police, Major Sylvester? It seems that this beating has not been confined alone to legal wives, but that there have been men who have beaten their common-law wives. I do not know how many such wives there are in the District of Columbia, but they are referred to, and also other females. Some Members have suggested that there ought to be an amendment to this bill to strike out the words "wife beaters" and insert the words "wife chasers." I do not know what the effect of this would be, but we are wanting to benefit the District of Columbia and protect the wives, "common-law wives, and other females" who are beaten. So you see that the recommendation of the President falls to the ground when analyzed, and even the suggestion of the chief of police is not acceptable to the gentleman who introduced this bill.

Now, when we look at the report of the committee on this bill it shows that in the fourth precinct there were 14 white and 72 colored out of a total of 86 arrests for wife beating, and in the sixth precinct there were 23 white and 73 colored out of a total of 96 arrests for this offense. When you get at the facts, nearly all these cases of wife beating occur when the husband, or common-law husband, or the "chaser," or whatever he may be designated, was under the influence of intoxicating liquor. The best way in the world to cure an evil of this kind is to remove the cause. Why does not the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] offer an amendment to abolish saloons in the District of Columbia, to stop all these habitual drunkards from getting drunk? Why have we not had recommendations along that line? If you want to stop an evil, the way to do it is to stop the cause which produces the evil. Why, the Government of the United States or the District of Columbia is a partner in every saloon in this District.

They charge a large fee or license and get a part of the profits of the business that makes wife beaters. Why does not the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if he is serious about this matter and really wants to stop wife beating, why doesn't he offer an amendment shutting up every saloon in the District of Columbia? You say that some beat their wives when sober. It may be that after having been drunk and brutalized themselves with liquor, that they have become brutes in the absence of liquor. I hardly think it necessary, Mr. Speaker, to discuss this bill much further.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES. In Kentucky we had a whipping-post law for petty larceny. That whipping was in public. This bill provides that it shall be private; that no person shall be present except the doctor and the person who does the whipping. Now, if the gentleman wants to stop wife beating, wouldn't it be a good thing to have it out where everybody can see it, where everybody could see how well the whipping was done—how well the lashes were laid on——

Mr. SIMS. In other words, whether he would whip them all alike, and not give thirty lashes lightly to one and thirty lashes heavily to another?

Mr. JAMES. Yes; so that they could see how the whipping was administered, and whether one man is whipped heavily and the other man lightly. My point is that if this is a good law it ought to be administered in the open light of day, where everybody can see how it is administered. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. I do not think it is good enough to administer anywhere, but I see the point of the gentleman's question—that if it is to be a deterrent, that if it is to be a warning to others, and if there isn't room enough elsewhere, we should build a platform on the top of the Washington Monument, so that people in the city may see and those from afar may also see [laughter] and know what we do, and will see that at least in whipping wife beaters we give a square, open deal. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to it, public or private; it has an element of brutality, as the gentleman indicated, by being done in private. Why need a surgeon if there is not going to be danger of taking human life? Why enact a law that requires the presence of a surgeon to execute?

Mr. CLAYTON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. CLAYTON. Has the gentleman any serious apprehension that this bill is going to pass?

Mr. SIMS. I haven't the slightest; but I do want the House to sit down on this proposition in such a fashion that no such bill will ever again be introduced.

Mr. JAMES. If the gentleman from Alabama will allow a suggestion. I made a suggestion a moment ago to the gentleman from Pennsylvania in the same direction as that of the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania took umbrage at it, and I suggest that the gentleman from Alabama may likewise be treated in the way I was.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania can not subject any of us to the whipping post. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Tennessee that he has now occupied ten minutes.

Mr. SIMS. I will now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I believe this matter ought to be taken seriously, and ought to be most soberly considered. The only argument that can be urged in its favor is that it tends to deter the crimes it punishes. There is no doubt that the auto-da-fé and the rack and the thumbscrew and the torture forcing confession from the pallid, quivering lips of a defendant all deter the crimes they are designed to punish. There is not an argument that can be used in favor of this brutal method of brutalizing a brute that can not be used in favor of all the dread instruments of torture that have been buried for a hundred years in the darkness of barbarism. [Applause.] I am surprised that this unusual measure should originate with the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania. Of all the men in the House, the last man to shed great tears as big as buttermilk biscuits over a suffering wife is the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Laughter.] If it had come from some distinguished Representative from Utah I might have listened with more patience. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLAYTON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. Some of us from the far South over on this side wish to know why the gentleman from Kentucky wants to make us hungry by mentioning buttermilk biscuits. [Laughter].

Mr. CLARK. Force of habit.

Mr. STANLEY. As the gentleman from Missouri says, force of habit and the time of day. Now, if the gentleman wants to take in all the suffering women of this country, I think he ought to accept an amendment. There are more of them that are in pain because they are unmarried than are in pain because they are married and are beaten. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Pennsylvania belongs to a class who really inflict more torture than the wife beater. Mental anguish is more terrible than physical pain, and if he would only think of the great number whom he has left alone lamenting and upon whom he should have mercy he would not inflict such agony on the fair sex. [Laughter.] If this bill is to go through I want to offer an amendment that a like punishment shall be inflicted upon not only those who are guilty of wife beating, but those who feloniously refuse to take one. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I want my gallant and lovable friend from Kentucky to tell me what he would do with a man, a husband, whom he saw beating his wife.

Mr. STANLEY. Well, that would depend upon the man, and also depend upon the wife. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Speaker, I know that my gallant friend from Kentucky answers me facetiously. I know him too well to believe that he would laugh and walk off idly and not lay his hands on him and tear the head off his shoulders, if it was necessary. [Applause.]

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the compliment which the gentleman from Tennessee pays me, but I do protest that I would hesitate to interfere, notwithstanding my southern chivalry, if the woman was red headed. [Laughter.] I do believe that if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] really understood the conditions, knew more of the temptations that flesh is heir to, if he could be induced to look with longing eyes toward some coy damsel weighing about 300 pounds, with auburn hair, he would change his mind about even the criminality of the offense which he attempts to punish. [Prolonged laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, the business of this House, when it meets to make laws for the whole country, is usually of a serious nature—so serious, in fact, that an occasional flash of humor is often felt as a relief, the same as a gleam of sunshine would be on a gloomy day. Yet there is a limit even to fun and hilarity. I am sure no Member who has any regard for the reputation of this body would enjoy a joke if perpetrated at the expense of the dignity and honor of our country. To me, therefore, and I hope to many others, it is a source of satisfaction to know that the performance of this comedy takes place when the House is meeting merely as a board of aldermen for the city of Washington.

It is true, many a decent alderman would have a right to object to what he might regard as an invidious comparison, because since the dawn of the eighteenth century no municipal legislature has ever been recorded as seriously proposing to stoop to the tortures of the Middle Ages as a punishment for any crime, not even for so heinous offense as wife beating. Bodies of that kind have dealt with antismoking, antispitting, antidrinking, antitreating, antitipping, and antiwhipping ordinances, but if any ever proposed that a man shall be morally assassinated by the whipping process and yet be cruelly permitted to continue his physical existence, the fact has escaped the chroniclers of history. No doubt the average alderman hesitated to borrow his punitive instruments from the chamber of torture out of consideration for the wife in such a case, the unfortunate wife who, already wronged and insulted by a brutal husband, would be punished still more severely by this mode of punishment inflicted upon her lawful partner in life. And can anyone take a different view of it? Will that poor woman not be branded for life? And will you not bring lasting shame and disgrace upon the innocent children, the blameless parents of the unfortunate couple, and upon the whole circle of their relations?

Mr. Speaker, the man who lays hands on woman in the manner described in this bill is a brute, and I have never known anyone to excuse wife beating, because there is, there can be, no excuse for such brutality. The only one who has a right to do it, and who frequently does do it, is the wife herself. The chief of police of this city, Major Sylvester, reports that "many of these cases were dismissed or nolle prosequied upon the request of the prosecuting witnesses."

Thus it seems that the wife, in the goodness of her heart, often forgives the husband's rash act, but while she thus, rightfully or wrongfully, shows her magnanimity, surely she would never consent to again accept as her side partner a whipped cur, a creature who has been publicly sent to the whipping post. And what about him? A living being, degraded and shorn of every claim to the consideration of his fellow-man, without honor, the last spark of self-esteem ruthlessly destroyed in him, handed over to the contempt of a pitiless world, with absolutely nothing to lose save the breath of life. Has the course of human justice ever been such as to bring forth a victim equal to him, even in the darkest ages? In Russia the knout is said to be applied to unruly prisoners, but Russian despotism is merciful in comparison with the provisions of this bill, because it withholds the names.

In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, it would be a thousand times more merciful to kill the offender outright. Will it have a deterring effect? Not any more than the gallows will deter a man from committing murder, and all will admit that the gallows in that respect has proved an absolute failure. The American woman enjoys the reputation of occupying a higher position socially than the woman of any other country, and as American men we are justly proud of that fact. [Applause.] The whipping post is sure to rob us of this proud distinction. And why? Because it involves the humiliating confession before all the world that in the United States such a contemptible institution is necessary to protect woman against the brutality of man; that the inviolability of the American woman can not be safeguarded otherwise. Are the Members of this House willing to destroy, by heralding this fatal admission abroad, the fair reputation of our country in the eyes of the civilized nations?

I say, rather let us, by voting down this bill, serve notice on them that as the honor and integrity of the flag does not depend upon the guns put up to guard it, but upon the moral conduct of the nation, so does the security and honor of woman, in America at least, not depend upon the revival of the whipping post, but upon the decency, the education, the refinement of the citizen. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have five minutes more.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I will not object if I can have five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. Do you not think it is better we should take a vote in this House rather than allow the world to think we ever seriously considered this matter in the House?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I was going to make that suggestion.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to understand the remarks the gentleman from Delaware addressed to the gentleman from Missouri. I could not hear, and the gentleman from Delaware represents, I believe, the only State that has a whipping post in it, and I want to know what his opinion is about this measure.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The gentleman suggested that the House should not lose its time, but proceed to a vote in order to avoid the impression that we are serious in this matter. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to really argue this monstrous proposition. If I had a constituency favoring it, I should prefer to resign my seat in Congress, return to my sanctum, take pen in hand, and write editorials against it. But to oppose it here and in all seriousness is not at all advisable, because by so doing the impression might be conveyed to the people that there was really danger of this country relapsing into barbarism. For this reason I shall change my tune and hope other opponents will also discuss the matter in a lighter vein.

In the treatment of this subject there are, fortunately, many alternatives left. In the first place, it could be treated with silent contempt and put out of the way by a rising vote. Furthermore, if we could not marvel at the originality of the father of this bill we could at least admire his courage and his well-meaning, though misplaced, chivalry. But the best course, after all, for the House to pursue, it seems to me, will be to enter into the spirit of the occasion. If the whipping post is a good thing for wife beating, other cruel inventions, dug out of the dust and débris of past ages, may prove a panacea against other offenses. And if this is the proper way to protect woman in one respect, why not try to protect her by similar means all along the line against all offenses which may be committed against her? In order to make this kind of legislation complete and apply it for the protection not only of married, but also of unmarried women, I suggest the fololwing amendments:

SEC. 3. Whenever hereafter any male person in the District of Columbia fails to properly support his wife and family, the court before whom such offender shall be tried and convicted shall direct him to be put upon the rack for such length of time as in the opinion of the public executioner will be an adequate punishment for the offense.

SEC. 4. Whenever hereafter any male person in the District of Columbia willfully deserts his wife or maliciously breaks the marriage vow, the court shall direct the public executioner to pinch such offender with red-hot tongs in the most suitable parts of his body for such length of time as in the opinion of such executioner shall be an adequate punishment for the offense.

[Laughter.]

SEC. 5. Whenever hereafter any male person in the District of Columbia of the age of 25 years and over persistently refuses to enter the state of matrimony, the court shall direct the public executioner to make such offender stand in the pillory until he promises to take unto himself a wife.

[Laughter.]

And if, after six months, it is found that this promise has not been faithfully kept, such offender shall be burnt at the stake.

[Great laughter.]

SEC. 6. To carry out the purposes of this act the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to purchase a whipping post, a rack, a pillory, and a stake, and a sum not exceeding $10,000 is hereby appropriated for such purpose out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

[Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I promised to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] for five minutes, and I was also very anxious to let the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] have five minutes, and I will ask unanimous consent that after the gentleman from Pennsylvania has had five minutes these other gentlemen have also five minutes each.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask for ten minutes more.

Mr. PAYNE. What is the request?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The request is that altogether an additional ten minutes be granted to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I think I will have to object to that.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Five minutes.

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON], as I promised.

Mr. MAHON. There are two sides to every question. I take it that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] is serious; at least, he hopes for the passage of the bill. We can not tell who will vote for it. It will not be a very gratifying thing to the people of this nation to have the other countries across the ocean witness the whipping of a President of the United States in the District of Columbia, or a Cabinet officer, Senator, or Representative. So I will offer an amendment to prevent that sort of thing.

Any man who has practiced law for thirty-five or forty years, as I have, and as have many other gentlemen here, and have had these family troubles in his office, not only among the humble, but the rich, where wives have come to tell dreadful tales, has found upon investigation that the trouble was not altogether with the husband. I have known good men—laboring men, not drunkards—who would come to their home at night and would find no supper cooked for them——

Mr. CLAYTON. Henpecked husbands, for instance?

Mr. MAHON. No; worse than that. The wife will begin to haggle and worry them—a woman that has a tongue with a sharp edge on each side and as rough as a file on its bottom, which she constantly uses from morning until night. If the husband would give her a little push to get rid of her, she would run to the magistrate's and prefer a charge of aggravated assault and battery. I have no patience with a man who would even strike a woman of that kind. A man who would strike a woman is a coward. If a woman would spit in my face on the streets, or anywhere, I would turn my back and walk away from her. But all men are not alike. There is such a thing as aggravating some men, and perhaps they will strike their wives. Now, our courts provide punishment, with a jury of twelve men and under a good judge, and the wife can convict a man for assault and battery or for an aggravated assault and battery, and send him to prison. I believe in Delaware they not only put them in the stocks and whip them, but they then send them to jail.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said before, we have all kinds of people in this world, and while the American women are the best women in the world, I find out, unfortunately, that among them is occasionally found a woman who can not control her temper or her tongue. And in order to protect the President, the Cabinet ministers, Senators, and Members of Congress, if in future they should take for better or worse such a wife, I offer the following amendment, and send it to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That any wife who shall become a common scold, commonly known as a "hell-cat," upon conviction, the court before whom such offender shall be tried and convicted shall direct the marshal of the District, in the presence of the public, to duck said offender in the Potomac River not less than five nor more than ten times: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the President, members of the Cabinet, Senators, and Members of Congress.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MAHON. Now, Mr. Speaker, has there been a point of order reserved on that amendment? Now, to be a little serious, the good women of this country——

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman offer that as an amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The proposed amendment was read only for information. This is not the time to offer an amendment.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to change my amendment so that instead of the marshal ducking these women, the author of this bill be privileged to take them out and spank them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, there are three gentlemen, Mr. SMYSER of Ohio, Mr. SULZER of New York, and Mr. GAINES of Tennessee, who desire five minutes each, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the time be so extended, and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] have a like amount.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee requests the time be extended fifteen minutes so that each of the gentlemen mentioned shall have five minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania a similar time.

Mr. PAYNE. I object.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I move, Mr. Speaker, the time be extended fifteen minutes so as to complete the consideration of this question.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order against that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is out of order. All this discussion is out of the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Have the other side exhausted their time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The other side have exhausted their time.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I yield thirteen minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I know that nothing I can say will save this bill. It ought to pass, but I am satisfied that it will not. It is a bill to prevent the crime of wife beating in the capital of this nation, and gentlemen all over this House are laughing at the idea of trying to prevent that crime in the capital of the nation. Five hundred and eight wives in the last two years have been beaten by their husbands, and gentlemen make merry over a law [applause] that seeks simply to bring proper punishment to the man who will whip his wife. And the gentleman from New York, the leader of this House, wanted to treat this question as one of such levity that even an hour ought to be devoted to it, and chivalric gentlemen from Kentucky—chivalric Kentucky—they make merry at the expense of those who want to take away from them the privilege of whipping their wives in the capital of the nation. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment this is a serious matter and ought to receive the serious attention of gentlemen. The bowels of compassion of the gentleman from Missouri yearn toward the wife beater. He thinks that it would result in the ruin and degradation of such a man to whip him. Can you ruin a beast like that? Can you discredit that kind of man? [Applause.] Will whipping make him more a beast?

We boast that the home, the American home, is the unit of our civilization. How can you have homes, American homes, where even in the capital of the nation men may whip their wives? The home is the ideal here, because of the equality that exists in husband and wife and child. No primogeniture, no entail; nothing of that kind. All are equal, and love presides over the home, and it makes the ideal home, nowhere else seen in all the world, because conditions such as these exist nowhere else.

But here in the capital of the nation there were 508 men who have destroyed their homes in the last two years, and it is proposed to do something to check that destruction of the home. Why, gentlemen say, there is ample provision now. There is no necessity for radical means. Why, our civilization has labored upon these men. That has failed. The teachings of the church have failed to influence them. The solemn ceremony that they have gone through when they took upon themselves the duties and obligations of establishing a home—to honor the wife, to love and to cherish the wife—they have failed. Every means that has been resorted to up to this time has been a failure—a complete, woeful, dismal failure—as is shown by this record, this horrible record of 508 cases in two years of time.

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir. I beg your pardon. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman tells us that there is ample law; that they can be punished. How? All the punishment to-day of the husband who is the malefactor intensifies the suffering and the punishment of the wife. He is the breadwinner most usually. It is not usually the man with abundance; and when you incarcerate him in the penitentiary you doom the wife and the children to added suffering, to the pangs of hunger and the rigors of cold. And that is in the capital. Is that the remedy? Ah, but the gentleman says, we will advertise to the capitals of the world that we must go backward centuries to the brutalities of mediæval times in order to protect our women. How much better it is to advertise to the capitals of the world and to all mankind that we are making a manly effort to suppress and exterminate this wrong than to allow it to go on in the capital of the nation and under the flag that means so much.

Mr. Speaker, this bill ought not to be received with levity; it ought to receive serious consideration of gentlemen. The remedy proposed may not be the best one, but some one other than those we have ought to be resorted to.

Something ought to be done to put an end to this record of horror and crime—this destruction of homes. Gentlemen say that you brand this man whom you punish in this way, and that his wife would never recognize him again, and that you put a stigma upon his children. Is it not better that they, innocent as they may be, should suffer sometimes rather than that this should go on and the child life of thousands be destroyed because of homes of this character?

Gentlemen, there are two sides to this question; and are we going to be deterred from using the only means that you can make applicable to this kind of men simply because learned gentlemen from chivalric Kentucky talk about thumbscrews and all of the punishments of inquisitorial days? No one wants to bring back those evil times; but if there is some one punishment that is adaptable to this class of men, to whom nothing else seems to be adaptable, I would not refuse it because civilization in the main has discarded its use and discarded in large measure the offenses that it was then applicable to. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill do lie upon the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York moves that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire whether, under the rule prohibiting any Member from voting where he has a personal interest in the result, the members from Maryland, where they have a whipping post for sale, will be allowed to vote on this question? [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from New York to withdraw his motion and let us have about thirty minutes more time for debate. Several gentlemen want time on this side.

Mr. PAYNE. I call for the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I trust the gentleman from New York will not insist upon that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 153, nays 60, answered "present" 7, not voting 164, as follows:

CONSOLIDATION OF CUSTOMS DISTRICTS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7114) to provide for the consolidation and reorganization of customs collection districts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7114.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order, and I raise the point of order that this bill is not privileged under any rule of the House. If the Chair desires to hear me upon the point of order, I am ready.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the rule of the House, which alone is applicable to this matter, is that which gives to the Committee on Ways and Means the right at any time to report and call up a measure raising revenue. It has, to be sure, been held over and over again in this House that a measure affecting revenue in any way comes under the provisions of this rule, but there is only one single, solitary ruling which says that a measure which is purely administrative shall be held to be included in this rule for giving privilege to measures raising revenue. That, Mr. Speaker, is a ruling of the late Speaker Reed in the Fifty-fifth Congress, when the point of order was raised against the privilege claimed for a certain bill known as the "Texas Free Zone bill."

The point at issue which was raised at that time was that the measure was not privileged. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] claimed that it was privileged because it would prevent smuggling, and therefore enhance the revenue. On the other side it was claimed that it would not enhance the revenue. The Speaker joined in the discussion entirely on the basis as to whether or not it would enhance the revenue, until Mr. Dingley of Maine rose in his seat and said that a similar question had been decided by Speaker Carlisle, and that the latter had held that a purely administrative customs bill must be held to be a measure for "raising revenue." Whereupon, Speaker Reed cited this decision of Speaker Carlisle and overruled the point of order, saying that it was immaterial whether or not the bill in question raised or lowered the revenue, in view of Speaker Carlisle's decision.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact, Speaker Carlisle never made any such decision as that cited by Mr. Dingley and followed by Speaker Reed. This will appear very clearly from a reading of the footnote in Parliamentary Decisions of the House of Representatives, paragraph No. 408.

Mr. Reed's decision was based on an erroneous statement made by Mr. Dingley on the floor of the House in discussing the point of order. Mr. Speaker Reed went on to say that Mr. Carlisle's interpretation having been given and the rules having been reenacted, the rule of the House must be held to be established. As a matter of fact, as I say, Mr. Carlisle never gave any decision. It is preposterous to say that any decision shall stand as the rule of this House for which there is just one precedent and that precedent based on an entirely incorrect presentation of the facts made by the late gentleman from Maine, Mr. Dingley.

But, Mr. Speaker, in addition to this objection, and taking it for granted that the late Speaker Reed's view is more likely to prevail with the present Speaker than my own, I invite the attention of the Speaker to the wording of this measure in line 6. He will observe that the President not only is authorized to establish convenient districts for the collection of customs, but he is also authorized to establish convenient districts for the "interests of commerce and shipping." Now, it is a well-known principle of parliamentary procedure, and has been so ruled by the present Speaker and by many others, that where a measure would otherwise be privileged under the rules of the House, if it contain within itself matter which is not privileged, the privileged character is taken away from the whole. Districts established for the "interests of commerce and shipping" have nothing whatever to do either with the raising of revenue or with the administration of our customs. A measure containing this provision can not be held to be privileged under the rule.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the ruling of Mr. Speaker Reed cited by the gentleman:

On May 4, 1898, Mr. CHARLES H. GROSVENOR, of Ohio, called up as a privileged matter the joint resolution (H. Res. 27) to repeal the joint resolution in reference to the Free Zone on the frontier of Mexico, the subject involved being the transportation of dutiable goods and its relation to smuggling.

Mr. Samuel W. T. Lanham, of Texas, made the point of order that this was not a bill "raising revenue."

After debate, the Speaker ruled:

"The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has really stated the identical point involved here, and that is as to the words 'raising revenue' for the support of the Government. The gentleman admits that if the bill were a bill affecting the raising of revenues he would regard the question of order as decided.

"The Chair thinks that the interpretation always given with reference to the pending point is such as to make it quite the equivalent of a bill 'affecting revenues,' as suggested by the gentleman from Texas, and that the mere language used of 'raising revenue,' instead of 'affecting revenue,' can have no material application to the question of order.

"Not only in the opinion cited by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Dingley], where Mr. Carlisle agreed that an administration bill was privileged in the same sense as the bill now presented, but in almost every other instance every tariff bill which has been considered by the House has contained, necessarily, some administration measures, pure and simple, which the bill would not have been entitled to carry unless in order and privileged under the rule, inasmuch as any unprivileged feature would necessarily take away from the bill the effect of such privileged matter as it might carry; and the Chair thinks that it has been the universal construction that all measures affecting the revenue or the methods of collection of revenue are understood to affect the raising of revenue. While it is true that any Speaker, when this question is raised, might construe the rules very strictly, nevertheless after they have been reenacted they are understood to be reenacted as carrying with them the construction placed upon the rules, just as the reenactment of a statute after a decision of the court is understood to be reenacted with the approval of that provision.

"So it seems to the Chair that, this being a measure relating to the revenues and the collection of the revenues, and without determining whether it increases or decreases the revenue, it is a matter that comes strictly within the rules and can be considered under the rules.

"The Chair therefore overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from Texas."

It would seem, Mr. Speaker, that this covers the point in this case. It allows the President to establish convenient districts, and the amendment, "to discontinue or consolidate ports and subports therein for the collections of revenue from customs, and for the interests of commerce and shipping, and for these purposes may subdivide any State or Territory within or appurtenant to the United States," etc. Of course, the establishment of ports has a most intimate connection with the collection of the revenue, it has the most intimate connection with the question of smuggling, as was decided in the Free Zone case, whether it be to prevent smuggling or whether it may simply facilitate smuggling, it still relates to the revenue. It would seem that this bill is in order, and not only in order, but in accordance with the established precedent of the House. We have here dozens of bills almost every Congress establishing a port or a subport here and there, or allowing the privilege of immediate transportation in bond.

All those bills came in as privileged matters and have been so treated in the House since I have been a Member of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to have the attention of the gentleman from New York. In lines 5 and 6 are the words "and for the interests of commerce and shipping." Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point that those words do not cover the subject that is privileged and being incorporated in the bill would destroy the privileged character of the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Those words are only incidental to the other, incidental to the collection of revenue. It is part of the administrative act; it is only incidental to it, and the whole language relates to the establishment of ports for the collection of customs.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the Chair and the gentleman from New York to the fact that after those words which he speaks of as incidental the bill reads, "and for these purposes," and thereafter treats the purposes as plural.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I think that the gentleman from New York is mistaken in supposing that those words, "for the interests of commerce and shipping," have anything to do with the collection of revenue. Obviously they refer to the facilities afforded at our custom-houses for the issue of registry to vessels, for the enrollment of vessels, and for the issue of licenses to fishing smacks. Various other functions entirely unconnected with the collection of revenue fall to the lot of collectors of customs. If the Chair is desirous of further instruction on such part of my point of order as related to the mistaken assertion of Speaker Carlisle's ruling——

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire to hear the gentleman upon that point.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me there is much force in what the gentleman from New York says in regard to the language which it is claimed destroys the privileged character of this bill. The privileged matter in the bill is that relating to the collection of customs. That is the primary purpose of this bill. It is for the purpose of enabling the President of the United States to reorganize and consolidate customs-collection districts for the collection of customs revenue. Now, in connection with these districts and with the duties of the officers who are charged with the responsibility of collecting revenues, they issue clearances to vessels and perform other duties relating to shipping and commerce. In the latter respect their duties relate only to shipping and commerce, but the primary purpose is the collection of revenue, and if the nonprivileged matter connected with the privileged matter is merely incidental to the primary object it does not destroy the privilege. To have that effect it must necessarily be dependent upon and form a part of that which is privileged. You can take this away entirely and yet there remains the primary object unaffected by the incidental matter which is contained in the bill or the matters that are incident to the collection of revenue. I think, inasmuch as it is a mere incident in connection with these customs districts and the duties of these customs officers to issue manifests or clearance of vessels, that you could eliminate that entirely and it would not affect or destroy the primary purpose of the bill, namely, the reorganization of customs districts, which certainly does relate to revenue and, under the decision cited by the gentleman from New York, is in order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a certain point of view to the Chair before he makes his ruling. I do not believe that a fair construction of this language will even bear the construction that the gentleman from Minnesota has suggested. My understanding of this language is that it is a description of the district and subdistrict now existing and which is to exist that may be affected by the action of the Secretary of the Treasury or President for the purpose of rearranging the collection districts, and I read the language in this way:

That the President is hereby authorized to establish convenient districts and to discontinue and consolidate ports and subports therein for the collection of revenue of customs and for the interests of commerce and shipping.

That is a description of the district itself and in nowise describes that which is to be done by the action of the President or that which is to be done by the operation of this bill. It is a mere description of the district; so that it ought to read and, in fact, ought to be construed in this way: The President is authorized, in the interest of the collection of revenue, to change the districts, ports, and subports now existing for the collection of the revenue and in the interest of commerce and shipping.

Those that are in existence for that purpose may be changed in the interest of the subject of collections.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] please give his attention, take the bill in his hand, and strike out, in line 5, the words "for the collection of revenue from customs?" Then the bill will read as follows:

That the President is hereby authorized to establish convenient districts and to discontinue or consolidate ports and subports therein for the interests—of commerce and shipping.

In the opinion of the gentleman from New York, would that be privileged?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think it would, because part of the sentence is emasculated, which refers the whole subject-matter to the collection of the revenue.

The SPEAKER. Precisely; but the Chair will suggest to the gentleman that if the words indicated were stricken out and the law was enacted, it would be operative. It would clothe the President with the power, would it not?

Mr. PAYNE. It would clothe the President with the power to establish districts to regulate commerce and shipping. If the Chair had left in "establish convenient districts and to discontinue or consolidate ports and subports therein," it would have been all right, but I think by striking out those words it would refer wholly to commerce and shipping. But those words are in the bill. They give character to it. It refers the whole subject-matter to the important part, namely, the collection of the revenue, and the commerce and shipping to be regulated are incidental to it.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] will permit me, I would suggest to the Chair if the words relating to commerce and shipping are eliminated, it certainly then would be clearly in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair agrees with the gentleman.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, if the Chair agrees, then, with that proposition, if without these words we clothe the President with the power to reorganize and consolidate those districts, when the districts are consolidated and the officers are appointed to discharge the duties connected with the collection of the revenue, all of the duties which are now imposed by law upon those officers would be performed independently of whether this refers to shipping and commerce or not. You could eliminate this language entirely, and when the districts are reorganized and the custom officers are appointed they would discharge identically the same duties they are discharging to-day, for they are discharging those duties under express authority of the statute. It is not proposed to change the duties of the officers in the least. My contention is that you can strike out of the bill entirely all reference to shipping and commerce and go on with the consolidation of these districts, appoint the officers to collect the revenue, and when that is done, if there are any duties that those officers have to perform to-day under the law in respect to commerce and shipping, they would have to discharge those same duties after the consolidation as they are doing now. So that it is not even an integral part of the bill. It is not an important or essential feature. And in cases where the privileged matter is not dependent at all upon the nonprivileged matter the nonprivileged matter does not destroy the privileged. I think that is the uniform ruling of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule, unless the gentleman desires to address the Chair further. The Chair would be ready to follow, touching the first point of order made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], the ruling by Mr. Speaker Reed, in which ruling the Chair concurs. Even without that ruling, the Chair would be inclined to hold that this bill under the rule was privileged. But the bill does more than that, as it seems to the Chair. It says that—

The President is hereby authorized to establish convenient districts and to discontinue or consolidate ports and subports therein for the collection of revenue from customs and for the interest of commerce and shipping.

There are two objects to be accomplished by this bill if enacted into legislation.

One, collection of revenue; the other in the interest of commerce and shipping. The first is privileged under the rule. The second, as it seems to the Chair, is not privileged. Uniform rulings, so far as the Chair knows or has been informed, seem to be, without exception, that a nonprivileged proposition coupled with the privileged, even if slight and incidental, destroys the privilege. That is quite familiar to gentlemen on resolutions making inquiry from the heads of the Departments. When they go beyond the question of inquiry as to a matter of fact, it destroys the privilege. The Chair does not think it necessary to amplify. It seems to the Chair quite plain that this nonprivileged matter destroys the privilege; and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

The gentleman from Massachusetts demands the regular order, which is the call of committees. That rests with the Committee on the Judiciary, and there comes over an unfinished bill, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11784) to authorize the recovery of the value of unlawful rebates and discriminations and penalty therefor, and for other purposes.

RECOVERY OF VALUE OF UNLAWFUL REBATES.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I call up the bill H. R. 11784.

The SPEAKER. The bill has been reported to the House.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] has twenty-three minutes remaining.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, other members of the committee will speak upon this bill, and as I have given it very full discussion in the House on the 29th of January I shall try to be brief.

Mr. Speaker, those who were not here then will want to know the purpose of the bill. We all feel that the chief cause of the growth of monopolies is that they obtain unlawful rebates and that there has been no way thus far by which this evil could be corrected. If a great monopoly gets rebates worth a million dollars—as it is reported some of them have—a fine of ten thousand or twenty thousand dollars is nothing. This bill provides that if in future there be such unlawful rebates, whether they are such by the common law or by the interstate-commerce act, the United States may bring an action against the person who shall receive them to recover back their value, suing on the civil side of any court of competent jurisdiction. It provides, secondly, that if those rebates be received knowingly—that is, willfully, double the value may be recovered. This double recovery will be chiefly in the case of secret rebates. There may be inequalities and unlawful discriminations made by open and public tariffs which are claimed to be lawful. The Government or the persons interested may then determine whether they be unlawful or not by a suit in court. But when that question has been adjudged, if the shipper knowingly and willfully persists in taking these rebates, then double the value can be recovered.

Again, there are cases where the evidence is hard to obtain, and the third section provides that this action by leave of the court may be brought under control of the court by an informant, who shall receive half of the recovery, but shall not discontinue the action until after notice to the Attorney-General and by leave of the court first obtained. One can hardly imagine the power that this provision will give against some great trust, if any one of its clerks, cognizant of a secret rebate, say some bookkeeper, can be induced thereby to bring the facts to knowledge of the public and see that recovery is had.

In the fourth section, Mr. Speaker, this remedy is declared to be in addition to other remedies. This bill does not propose to punish anyone criminally. It is a remedy which simply enforces the principle that all are equal before the law, and that if any person or corporation receive such favor as gives an advantage over others in dealing with common carriers, that person or corporation must yield up the value of that special favor, so that equality shall be again established.

Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether I have explained this as well as I did before. I do not desire to take so much of the time of this House as I did before; but the committee believes—for this matter has been under consideration in committee for six years—that this is the only real remedy for unlawful rebates which will make all the people of this land equal in their dealings with common carriers.

I yield the remainder of my time to the chairman of the committee [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to invite the attention of the Members of the House to two points in this bill, which has been before the Judiciary Committee for the last three years. It has had very careful consideration, and, I believe, comes to the House with a unanimous report.

In the first place, it interferes with no law upon the statute book. It is simply cumulative of whatever may have been passed upon this subject. Other laws may parallel it, but it interferes with and impinges upon none of them. As stated in the last section of the bill, it is simply cumulative of other acts.

The second point is that it allows the informant one-half of the amount that shall be recovered, and this, it seems to me, is the chief merit of the bill. A clerk, if you please, who is in the employ of some great trust or corporation, and who has access to its books, knows if it has been illegally receiving rebates. He knows from whence it comes and how to prove it. It is before him on the books, which he can produce at any time. It is easy for such a witness to have suit brought and to furnish evidence. One-half of the amount recovered easily stimulates his desire to disclose dishonest methods.

Every Member in this House knows that the fear of the informer is the great power that enforces the collection of excise taxes. Men who deal in liquor hang up in their places of business the license of the Government, not so much because the United States have officials going about the country as because of the knowledge that every man who buys liquor may become a spy, a detective, whose reports are certain to lead to prosecutions.

It is rare that one can visit a place where liquor is sold and not find Uncle Sam's license plainly exhibited, not because keepers are afraid of the United States marshal and his deputies, but because they fear their own customers, who may at any time turn informers and bring trouble and embarrassment.

Now, this bill gives clerks in the employ of corporations that are getting rebates illegally an incentive to inform the Attorney-General or district attorney of wrong practices and of becoming witnesses to prove them. This feature of the bill has commended itself to some of the gentlemen on the Judiciary Committee, and I feel confident that, as a business proposition, it will commend itself to the gentlemen of this House, for the fear of the saloon keeper who is selling without a license will enter the countinghouse of every corporation which is doing business illegally. It places them in the embarrassing position of knowing that their clerks, who, under this law, can receive a generous portion of the recovery, may reveal their dishonest methods at any moment.

These two points, therefore, that this bill is simply cumulative of other statutes, and that it opens a way for the Government to learn of dishonest practices, are, in my opinion, excellent reasons for passing this measure. [Applause.]

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill is in furtherance of what seems to be a desire on the part of this House to make more effective the laws now existing for the prevention of rebates and preferences. The Elkins law—the act of 1903—does not have in it a provision to recover of the beneficiary of the secret preference or rebate for such preference or rebate. There is, under existing law, only a doubtful way to get at the man who receives the secret preference or rebate. The bill that we passed here the other day was, in one of its provisions—section 20—an improvement on the Elkins law, in that it furnished other means for ascertaining the giving of a secret preference and rebate by reason of the fact that it prescribed certain bookkeeping and certain publicity that gave necessary information of the violation of the law.

Under existing law the company that gives the secret preference—the rebate—is punished. Now, the object of this bill is to reach in another way the man who receives a secret preference or rebate. When you reach both parties to this conspiracy, when you reach both parties to this violation of the law—the company or corporation that gives the rebate and the company or corporation or person that receives it—then you will go much farther toward preventing the giving of these rebates and preferences, and that is the object of this bill.

The first section of it has been criticised by some for the reason that it does not require the person who receives the rebate to be guilty of offending against the provision to have knowledge of that preference or that rebate. The answer to that criticism is this: That it is often a difficult matter to prove, I believe, what the law books call the "scienter," or guilty knowledge. And we may say further that doubtless it will never occur in the history of the administration of this act, should it become a law, in any case where any person or company receiving any rebate that he or it did not know of the rebate or preference. This feature of the bill is in the nature of prescribing the rule of evidence to govern the case.

Now, under the second section of the bill the knowledge must be shown affirmatively. The person who receives the rebate or preference must be shown by positive evidence that he knowingly received it, knowing that it was a rebate or preference not given to others.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, in case the action is instituted and judgment had under the second section of the act, the penalty is in double the amount of the secret preference or rebate. Now, as I said in the beginning, if we want to make effective the provisions of law against rebates and preferences, let us punish, in the manner proposed in this bill, those who receive these preferences. There will be fewer persons to ask them and fewer persons to grant them if this be done. The machinery provided here is common to the law. It will enable, through the medium of giving the informant half the recovery, the officers of the law to get proof in cases where now they are unable to get that proof; so I think, as I said before, that the bill is in consonance with and in furtherance of the legislation that is existing and that which we proposed to enact by the passage of the railroad-regulating bill the other day. It is in furtherance of existing law and will do a great deal toward stopping the accepting of secret preferences and rebates. In my judgment the bill ought to pass. [Applause.]

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY].

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Speaker, in so far as the purpose of this bill may be to prevent and to punish rebates it has my full and entire sympathy. I am of the opinion, however, that the bill is subject to some criticism, and it is to make that criticism that I take the floor. Rebates ought to be prohibited and ought to be punished. Not only should the giver of the rebates be punished, but the receiver as well, and such is the law now. The law could not be more emphatic or positive against the man who receives a rebate than it is now, and the fear and apprehension that I have concerning this bill is that, in the first place, it may prove ineffective and abortive, and in the second place, serve to confuse and complicate the existing situation. I have no special objection to the passage of the bill if it is the will of the House to pass it, but I desire to say that in my judgment what this bill seeks to do could be done far more effectively in another way, and I took the liberty of suggesting that way to the honorable gentleman who introduced it. The present law, known as the "Elkins law," provides in express terms, after defining a rebate as any device whatever by which property is transported at less than the published tariff rates, that—

> Every person or corporation who shall offer, grant, or give or solicit, accept, or receive any such rebates, concessions, or discriminations shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $20,000.

We therefore have upon the statute books to-day a penal law against a man who receives a rebate. What does this bill propose to do? It is claimed to be an authorization for a civil suit against a man who receives a rebate, but I have not been able to make up my mind clearly that such a suit would be simply a civil suit. Certainly the receiver of the rebate does not owe the value of that rebate to the United States Government. He might possibly owe it to the railroad that unlawfully gave it to him. He might possibly owe it to some competitor who had been wronged, but he does not owe it to the United States Government, and therefore I conclude that when the Government undertakes to assume to recover in a suit the value of such rebate the suit of the Government is a penal suit and the amount of the recovery is a punishment. The punishment imposed in the first section of this bill is the amount or value of the rebate or concession that is received. The second section of the bill provides that if it be shown that the rebate was knowingly and willfully received the Government may recover twice the value of such rebate or concession, and thus the punishment here is twice that imposed by the first section. To my mind there is no distinction between the first section and the second section so far as concerns each of them being in its nature penal. It is a punishment for the Government to collect by forfeiture the value of the rebate and it is likewise a punishment for the Government to collect by forfeiture twice the value of the rebate.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman a question right there. Is it not entirely competent for Congress to prescribe the rule of evidence or the amount of evidence necessary, taking the view that it is a criminal case or a civil case, to authorize a judgment or a conviction in any case?

Mr. BRANTLEY. I do not understand that this bill undertakes to prescribe any rule of evidence of any sort or character, but when it provides that the Government can only collect the value of a rebate when it is shown to be an unlawful rebate, the conclusion is irresistible that before the Government can maintain a suit at all it must show that the party being sued has committed the crime of receiving an unlawful rebate. Now, the law presumes every man innocent until he has been convicted. Are we proposing to exact a forfeiture from a man as a punishment for a crime before we have convicted him by proper proof under rules of evidence, whatever they may be, that he has committed the crime? I am inclined to doubt whether the suit authorized by the bill could be maintained at all until there has been a prosecution and a conviction under what is known as the Elkins law.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, in the case of swindling, does the gentleman mean to say that a man ought not to sue and get his property back if he has been swindled out of it unless the evidence is so strong that you can convict the man of the crime of swindling beyond a reasonable doubt?

Mr. BRANTLEY. Not at all, but that proposition is entirely foreign to this.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. What is the difference in the application of that to the rule of evidence?

Mr. BRANTLEY. This is the difference. If the Government undertook to collect the value of property another had been swindled out of, it would be the Government imposing a penalty for the swindling. The case the gentleman cites is a case between two individuals. It is a suit for money had and received. The suit authorized here is a suit by the United States Government against a man that the Government says has committed a crime, and to exact a forfeiture from him by reason of that crime.

I am very much inclined to the view that before the Government can collect the forfeiture out of him the Government must convict him of having committed the crime. Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill if enacted into law and the same is sustained as a valid law, will change the present law, for it provides, in connection with the Elkins law, for two punishments against a man who receives a rebate and still leaves the railroad, the party who gives the rebate, to suffer but one punishment. The present law provides the same punishment for the giver as for the receiver. Here is a bill that by its own terms is claimed to be merely cumulative of the old law, providing an additional punishment upon the receiver of the rebate. Now, another apprehension I have about this bill is that I do not see very well how the Government can punish a man twice for the same act, and what I am afraid of is that the effect of this bill may be to repeal the Elkins law, a wise and proper penal law upon the same subject, at least so far as the receiver of the rebate is concerned. If it does not serve to repeal it I am afraid it will serve to confuse the present situation by producing complicated and protracted litigation, pending which the enforcement of punishment against anybody will be delayed. Mr. Speaker, the suggestion of the honorable gentleman who offers this bill that any different rule of law will apply in the taking of evidence under it from the rule that prevails in taking evidence under the Elkins law, I do not think well founded. In other words, under this bill before the Government can recover from the receiver of the rebate it must show an unlawful act. The bill so provides.

Can not a man claim the shield of protection against testifying to that which would incriminate him in a suit under this bill the same as he could under the Elkins law or any other criminal law? Now, as I said a while ago, if the House wants to pass this bill I have no objection to its being passed. My own judgment, however, is that if we want to make the present law more effective—and I would like to see it more effective, and if I had my way about it and could have controlled the Judiciary Committee I would have taken this bill and grafted it upon the Elkins law and would have provided that when a man is convicted of the offense of receiving a rebate he should pay not only the fine mentioned in the Elkins law, but in addition should pay the amount of the value of the rebate that he received. I would also provide that an informer instigating and bringing on a prosecution should receive not only half of the recovery, but half of the fine also. My judgment is, if we would continue to let rebates be a crime and continue to enforce the law against them as crimes, and increase the punishment and the incentive to prosecute, in this way we would have much better results than can possibly be had by providing for two different punishments, calling one civil and another criminal, for the same identical act. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that this is a very good bill for the purposes for which it was framed. Its main purpose is to deprive men of a motive to hold up the railroads and force them to give rebates. The first section of the bill subjects the man who has received an unlawful rebate to suit, and provides that he shall pay back the amount of the rebate or discrimination which he has received, regardless of the question as to whether he received the rebate "knowingly" or not. The next section provides that when he shall "knowingly" receive a rebate or discrimination he shall pay double. The beginning of section 3 gives a motive of suit to enforce the bill. "What is everybody's business is nobody's business," as a rule, and unless "everybody" has something to make by attending to the business. The first part of this section 3 therefore makes the informant receive half of the amount to be recovered and empowers him to sue. Then there is a practical danger that people of bad character, acting as informants, might sue railroads for the purpose of "holding them up;" that is, for the purpose of receiving from the roads a settlement in money to dismiss the case. The next part of this section undertakes to prevent that by saying that after a suit has been once begun by an informant it shall not be dismissed by him except after notice to the Attorney-General and with the leave of the court, and that in case there is undue delay upon the part of the informant in carrying on the suit it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to proceed with the suit. Section 4 merely provides that this measure shall be cumulative and shall not repeal any other remedy which the people have by suit in law or in equity or by prosecution under the laws already in existence.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. To the gentleman, who has had large legislative experience and is familiar with the legislative history of the country, this manner of proceeding here in this case, of providing a civil remedy for damages for the violation of a law where there is a penalty provided in another law, is not new or novel in legislation. Doubtless the gentleman can recall a number of instances where just such—if I may so term it—"ancillary legislation" as this has been had.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Auxiliary legislation?

MMr. CLAYTON. Auxiliary legislation. That is perhaps a better expression.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Damage of wife or children for murder of husband or father, for example. Now, Mr. Speaker, the point is made that this goes to somebody to whom it is not due, to wit, the United States Government; that the Government of the United States has not lost anything, and therefore the Government of the United States ought not to be repaid.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. BRANTLEY. The gentleman, if he is referring to my position, misunderstood me entirely. My proposition was that the party not owing this to the Government, for the Government to collect it would be the imposition of a penalty; would make it penal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood that, and I was trying to state it that way, that the Government could not sue in a civil action, or ought not to recover, because it had lost nothing.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is a high sense in which the Government has lost money. These rebates and discriminations go on in violation of law and at the expense of the public business—the commerce of the United States—attacking its integrity, equality, and distribution. Of course in no strictly legal sense is the Government of the United States a "legal representative" of the people of the United States; but this money is due to the people of the United States who have been discommoded, who have been defrauded, who have lost money, whose affairs have been dislocated, who have suffered absolute and actual loss by the existence of just this sort of practice. In a political sense, the Government of the United States is by far the fairest and fittest party to receive the money unless you ascertain—which you can not with precision do—just what particular competitive shippers have suffered by loss of business which has gone to these people who have received rebates. In a high public sense, then, the Government of the United States is "the legal representative" of the people of the United States, and it is very fitting and proper that in that way the money should be paid back to them. Now, I do not think there is much in the point that a prior prosecution would be necessary in order to show that the man had violated the law—in other words, that the rebate was "unlawful." Of course it is stated here that there must be "an unlawful rebate," but that is merely a fact to be established in the civil suit as a predicate for recovery, and a fact to be established not by the rules of criminal evidence, but by the rules of civil evidence. So that I do not think there is much in that. I do not think it can repeal any part of the existing law. I do not think gentlemen will think so if they read section 4 fully and carefully. Now, then, this objection is made—that a man might be "convicted" upon his own testimony. In the first place, this is not a conviction. It is a suit to recover for the common treasury damages done to the people, damages done to their commerce and to industry. But in the next place, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for two minutes more for the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the next place, Mr. Speaker, if the parties were subsequently prosecuted no lawyer would contend that the evidence taken in the civil case could be used against them, even though they, as witnesses, had incriminated themselves. They could keep off the stand in a criminal case, and this evidence could not be used against them in any manner whatsoever. Moreover, even in a civil suit no man can be made to answer a question which might lay him liable to subsequent prosecution.

Mr. CLAYTON. And the judgment in this case could not be pleaded in bar of a prosecution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And could not be pleaded in bar of a prosecution. And then practically, Mr. Speaker—because I like things to be looked at from a practical standpoint wherever possible—practically the fine will seldom, if ever, be recovered on the man's own testimony. It will be recovered as the result of somebody's else testimony, and the relator—the informant—and the Government alike will find that they will have to depend upon the testimony of somebody besides the man sued in order to recover the penalty.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary for me to add much to what has been said in favor of this bill. I believe that it is a wise measure and ought to be supported by every man in this body. Congress has been at work a good many years in its efforts to break up the systems of rebates that have prevailed in this country; and I believe that this measure will go as far to achieve that end as any measure that has ever been passed by Congress.

In the first place, the proceeding provided for in this bill is in the nature of a civil proceeding. It will not require proof beyond a reasonable doubt that the rebate has been received, but simply a preponderance of testimony will enable the United States Government to recover in an action brought under this bill if it should be enacted into law.

Now, the first section of the bill provides that the Government may institute an action against anyone who receives any unlawful rebate. It sometimes happens in the course of dealing with railroads and other carriers that men receive rebates without actual knowledge of the fact. The railroad is not entitled to recover the amount of the rebate, because it has voluntarily surrendered all claim to the amount given when it made the concession; the party to whom it is given is not entitled to it, because the laws of the land have forbidden him to receive rebates, and I know of no person or any other organization more entitled to take the sum that has been given in the form of rebates than the United States Government.

It is very similar, Mr. Speaker, to the cases of illicit distilling, where the Government detectives go along and discover a man running a still. The Government takes his still and destroys it. It does not keep it, it is true; but the Government takes charge of it, takes the ownership of it, and destroys it; and yet that does not relieve the man who has been operating the illicit distillery from punishment for operating it. So in this case, Mr. Speaker, instead of its being in the nature of punishment, it is simply taking from the wrongdoer the ill-gotten gain. It can not be punishment to take from a man that which he has unlawfully gotten. The way to punish a man is to take from him something that belongs to him and not something that does not belong to him, the fundamental idea being to withdraw some right from the violator of the laws; and in taking these sums, received in the form of a rebate, the Government of the United States, instead of depriving him of some right, takes from the men who receive them that which never did belong to them.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman why, upon his theory, the United States Government might not change its entire penal system, and, by adopting the form of bringing damage suits against those who break its laws, recover as penalties the amount of illegal profits gained by breaking the laws, and by such process deprive the person against whom the action is brought of his constitutional rights upon a criminal proceeding to refuse to be a witness against himself?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman evidently did not understand the statement I have just made. I said that it was not a punishment of the man who has unlawfully received the money to take that money from him by the Government. That is no punishment at all. It is something like taking from a thief the stolen goods he has possessed himself of in violation of law.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him this question?

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Will my colleague permit me to make one suggestion?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I yield first to my colleague from Kentucky.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I want to make this suggestion: That every State in the Union where a person is killed by careless or negligent use of firearms, for example, the man is often indicted, tried, and acquitted of the manslaughter, and still the widow or children may institute a suit for damages, and recover damages. Such laws are in force, I think, in every State in the Union.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I do not think there is any State that has not such a law as has been referred to by my colleague. Now I will respond to a further question from the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Suppose a clerk in the post-office has stolen Government funds and instead of proceeding against him criminally the Government should sue him for damages, and in that damage suit the court will hold that he take the witness stand and testify. In that situation you would not have had a trial under the criminal law, and if he should lose in this damage suit then you would have the effect of convicting the man of a crime and yet have deprived him of his right to refuse to testify against himself.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman is unfortunate in the case that he cites, because in a case where the Government employee under bond has embezzled any property of the Government it can sue him upon his bond and recover the full amount, and, so far as that is concerned, in case he is not under bond it can institute suit and it may recover judgment and enforce collection thereof if property can be found, and still prosecute him criminally for the embezzlement or other crime that he has committed.

Mr. CLAYTON. And the judgment in the civil action would not be a bar to the criminal prosecution.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. And that would not be a bar to the criminal prosecution. That is on all fours with this case, and I think the bill ought to become a law.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the bill and amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMENDMENTS IN JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I call up the bill (H. R. 12709) to allow and regulate amendments in judicial proceedings in the courts of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in any suit in equity instituted in the courts of the United States wherein it shall be decided prior to final decree that the complainant has a complete and adequate remedy at law the complainant may, at his election, upon such terms as the court may impose, cause the same to be transferred to the law docket of the court, there to be proceeded with as if originally instituted as a suit at law.

SEC. 2. That where in any suit brought in or removed from any State court to any circuit court of the United States the jurisdiction of the circuit court is based upon the diverse citizenship of the parties, and such diverse citizenship in fact existed at the time the suit was brought or removed, though defectively alleged, either party may amend at any stage of the proceedings and in the appellate court upon such terms as the court may impose, so as to show on the record such diverse citizenship and jurisdiction, and thereupon such suit shall be proceeded with the same as though the diverse citizenship had been fully and correctly pleaded at the inception of the suit, or, if it be a removed case, in the petition for removal.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a brief explanation of the provisions of this bill. It has a twofold object. The first section of the bill provides for an amendment in the case where a suit has been brought in equity and the remedy is found to be not in equity, but at law.

Every lawyer knows that the complainant in a case in equity must decide at his own peril, at the beginning of his suit, whether he has a complete and adequate remedy at law or whether his remedy is in equity. Having decided that at the beginning, the litigation may drag along for months and perhaps for years, and finally the court may determine that the complainant had a complete and adequate remedy at law, and therefore his bill in equity must be dismissed. He has incurred a great expense, and perhaps the statute of limitations has run against his action at law. His suit is dismissed, and he is left without remedy, and justice is defeated.

This bill is in the line of all modern legislation. When the court decides that the remedy is on the law side or on the equity side, as the case may be, the court shall then and there have the power, and it shall be its duty, to transfer the case to that docket where the correct remedy can be applied. That is the purpose of this bill, that where the remedy is decided to be at law and not at equity, to allow the court, when it reaches that decision, to transfer the case from the equity side of the docket to the law side, and proceed with the trial of the case and the administration of justice. Now, that is the first provision of the bill.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. Where the case is transferred from one calendar to the other, does the bill provide for the remodeling of the pleadings?

Mr. CLAYTON. That is left to the rule of practice in the courts. Nothing is said in the bill about that, except that the transfer shall be made upon such terms as the court may impose. I may say for the benefit of the gentleman from Iowa that this particular wording of this bill has the approval of two circuit judges of one of the circuit courts of appeal.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, may I make a suggestion?

Mr. CLAYTON. You may.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. In line 6, of section 1, it provides that where the complainant has a complete and adequate remedy at law—

> The complainant may at his election * * * cause the same to be transferred to the law docket of the court.

Now, suppose in the progress of the litigation it turns out that the complainant does not wish to avail himself of that remedy, but that perhaps a counter claim or a set-off is made, and the defendant has a good defense upon the law side, of which he can not avail himself upon the equity side, or has a good defense upon the equity side which he can not properly present on the law side. In other words, he is on the wrong side of the docket. Now, why should not that remedy be given to the defendant as well as to the complainant?

Mr. CLAYTON. Perhaps that is so, but the gentleman is presenting an imaginary case. Perhaps that sort of a case has occurred, or perhaps it may occur; but perhaps it has not occurred, and perhaps it may not occur. We are not playing the game of "perhaps" here now, but we are following the well-pointed-out defects in the law and seeking a remedy not for what perhaps has occurred nor perhaps may occur, but what undoubtedly has occurred in cases where justice was defeated. We are legislating to remedy judicially ascertained defects in the law. I will refer the gentleman to the case of Busard v. Houston, 119 United States, page 347, where this exact defect in the law was pointed out which this first provision of the bill seeks to remedy. Now, with all due deference to the gentleman, it may be well for him to prepare a bill on the line he has suggested, or to prepare an amendment. We are attempting to legislate for ascertained, existing evils.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I do not mean to be hypercritical, and I merely wish to suggest that it constantly occurs in litigations in the courts that the defendant litigant wants to avail himself of the same remedy. It is not a question of "perhaps" at all, and I want to know why the remedy you propose to grant here for the complainant should not be extended to the defendant also? The gentleman from Alabama knows, in his long and successful law practice, that the suggestion I make is not a hypothetical one, is not a perhaps, but a thing that has constantly occurred in the courts.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I will ask the gentleman from Alabama if he does not think the objection would be met by an amendment allowing the defendant to transfer as well as the complainant?

Mr. CLAYTON. Perhaps so. I can not recollect of any case in the Federal courts where justice has been defeated in such a case as the gentleman from Kentucky suggests, and in my correspondence with the judges in reference to this bill, and in talking with the lawyers on the Judiciary Committee and the lawyers who practice in the Federal courts, none of them have ever suggested the proposition now urged by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I am not urging any alteration in this bill at all. I merely made what I thought was an amicable suggestion in the way of assistance.

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly. The gentleman knows that the hour for adjournment has about come, and he knows that all the defects in the existing law can not be remedied in one bill. The Judiciary Committee of this House submits to this House that it has done its best to remedy an existing defect in the law, which has been ascertained and pointed out by the judiciary of the country; and if the gentleman from Kentucky, in his large experience, will introduce a bill with various provisions seeking to cure other defects of the law, and bring it in here and support it with his great ability, I have no doubt that I will not be hypercritical, but will back him up and endeavor to pass it.

Now, as to the second provision. On account of the loose language employed in the act of 1887, amended in 1888, providing for the removal of cases on the ground of diverse citizenship, the words "resident," "inhabitant," and "citizen," are used indiscriminately and in a confused way. On account of that confusion in the statute it is a common thing for the average practitioner in drawing his pleadings to indulge in the same confusion and inaccuracy, and he brings his suit into the Federal court predicated upon diverse citizenship, and instead of alleging technically—the courts are very technical on that point, you must be technical and precise in alleging diverse citizenship—as I say, instead of being technical the average lawyer draws his pleadings in the same loose way. You can not use correctly the words "resident" or "inhabitant" in this connection, but must use "citizen." Now, if it is pointed out in the circuit court that you have not alleged with technical precision the diverse citizenship which the law requires, you can amend there, but if you overlook it in the circuit court, if it is not taken advantage of there, and it gets into the court of appeals, it can not be waived there, it can not be amended there, it can not be overlooked there, or if it is overlooked, if it is waived, the Supreme Court upon certiorari will reverse it and dismiss the case. The case of Knight v. Lutcher, Moore & Co., 136 Fed. Rep., 404, settles this. That is the law.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if this amendment applies solely or generally after the case has been tried so as to make the pleading conform to the proof?

Mr. CLAYTON. It applies in the circuit court of appeals. You try your case in the circuit court, and this defect was not pointed out. The case is tried on its merits, and it is a mere technical defect and was not discovered or was not pointed out or was not taken advantage of. In the circuit court of appeals, by the provisions of this bill, the technical defect in pleading can be cured, and the case can proceed, if there is no other error in the case, and the litigation may be settled.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It simply allows him to amend the pleading to conform with the proof?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes.

Mr. BOWERS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. BOWERS. Is not this bill really a bill to cure defects in lawyers rather than in the law? [Laughter.]

Mr. CLAYTON. That is to some extent a just criticism. I have no doubt the gentleman from Mississippi has been guilty, at some time in his long practice, of defective pleading. The bill is in line with modern legislation which seeks to allow defective technical pleadings to be amended, to the end that justice may be done.

Mr. BOWERS. I never have gone out of court on it, I will say to my friend.

Mr. CLAYTON. I shall incorporate in my remarks the report prepared by me for the committee. It makes a full explanation of the bill:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12709) to allow and regulate amendments in judicial proceedings in the courts of the United States, report the same with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill is in the interest of the better administration of justice by the courts.

However difficult the question may be the complainant must decide at his own peril, at the beginning of his suit in equity, that he has no complete and adequate remedy at law. (See Buzard v. Houston, 119 U. S., 347.)

If the court decides that his remedy is an action at law, his bill is dismissed regardless of the merits of his case. This may be after much delay and after great expense has been incurred. It may be that then his cause has become barred by the statute of limitations, and if so, that justice has been defeated.

The first section of this bill seeks to cure this. It gives the right to transfer the case from the equity side of the court to the law side, upon such terms as the court may prescribe, to the end that injustice may not be done to either party to the cause.

The second section of the bill is to allow defective pleading to be cured in the appellate court, so that a mere technicality may not be invoked to defeat a meritorious cause.

The jurisdiction of a circuit court in any case must appear of record. The decisions of the Supreme Court are very technical and exacting in this particular. The average lawyer makes omissions and mistakes in his pleadings upon which jurisdiction is founded, although the requisite diverse citizenship of the parties really exists, and the cause is one which can be rightfully brought into the United States court.

In the statute and amendment (judiciary act of 1887, amended in 1888) providing for the removal of causes on account of diverse citizenship the words "resident," "inhabitant," and "citizen" are used in such a way as to cause confusion to one who is not familiar with the distinctions between these terms. The ordinary lawyer in his pleadings in the circuit court often uses "resident" or "inhabitant" when he means "citizen," and should employ that word.

Under existing law this defect may be cured in the circuit court by amendment, but if the defect be first discovered or taken advantage of in the circuit court of appeals the amendment can not be allowed, and the appellate court is not permitted to ignore or overlook the defect. If it does, the Supreme Court on the certiorari will reverse the decision. (Knight v. Lutcher-Moore L. Co., 136 Fed. Rep., 404.)

If the amendment could be allowed in the appellate court the case might be affirmed, the litigation ended, and justice administered.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I call for the previous question.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I am desirous of introducing an amendment that will carry out the purposes of the second section, and I wish to know when I can offer it.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is not demanded or ordered, the gentleman can offer it now.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Then I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will withdraw his demand for the previous question.

Mr. JENKINS. I will withdraw it, Mr. Speaker, and yield to the gentleman to offer his amendment.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I offer the following amendment, Mr. Speaker, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 2 of the bill the following: "Provided, That this section shall not apply in any case where the petition for removal has been overruled in the State court."

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the intention of the amendment is to carry out the purpose, as I understand it, of this second section. If, on account of defective pleading, a party is about to lose a right supposed to be guaranteed by law, this bill in the second section allows him to amend his pleading in the Federal court; but it may be that the petition for removal will have been overruled, thus leaving the case in the State court. Suppose the pleading is such that the State court overrules the petition for removal, under this bill the trouble may be remedied in the Federal court by amendment, and there we have the case in two courts if petition for removal has been denied in the State court. This, it seems to me, would be unfair. It is not the fault of the plaintiff, and yet he loses his right to stay in the State court. On the showing, on the face of the petition, removal should not be granted; but under this bill, and under our decisions as they now stand, the transcript can be carried to the Federal court, and there the pleading may be amended. Hence we have the case in two courts. It seems to me the party who claims the right to amend his pleading ought not by his own fault to put his adversary at a disadvantage. I think the second section should not apply in a case where in the State court the petition for removal has been overruled; and I believe my amendment will carry out the real intention of this second section, which evidently is to remove technical obstacles from our judicial procedure and pleading.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, just a word in reply to the gentleman from Texas. I think if his amendment were adopted it would go a long way toward defeating the object of this second section of the bill. The second section of the bill is to correct that defective pleading, it matters not when or where that defective pleading happened, so that in the end justice may be done. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RANDELL of Texas) there were—ayes 9, noes 31.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. OTJEN to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Edgar Parry, Fifty-eighth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I desire at this time to ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday, February 21, the Senate shall take up Senate bill 88 and proceed to vote upon the same and any amendments that may be offered to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that on Wednesday, February 21, the Senate shall take up Senate bill 88, known as the "pure-food bill," and proceed to vote upon it and all amendments now pending or hereafter offered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and consent is given.

Mr. HEYBURN subsequently said: I desire, having made some inquiry at the desk, to make more explicit the order, so that it shall read "after the routine morning business," in regard to fixing the time for a vote on Senate bill 88.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that Senate bill 88 shall be taken up after the close of the routine morning business on February 21 next.

Mr. HEYBURN. Unanimous consent has already been given to take it up, and I merely ask that the order be made to provide that it shall be taken up after the routine morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next business in order is Senate bill 529, under the unanimous-consent agreement of February 5.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. I call the attention of the clerks to page 6, line 5, where an amendment was put in the bill, with the suggestion that a comma should be placed after the word "public;" that is all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be made.

Mr. GALLINGER. On page 11, line 17, the word "desired" should be changed to the word "needed," to conform to an amendment made previously.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 17, strike out the first word in the line, the word "desired," and insert in lieu the word "needed," so as to read: "When the repairs shall be needed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer two proposed amendments which I think it desirable to have printed and lie on the table so that they may be examined.

Mr. ALLISON. Let them be read.

Mr. GALLINGER. They might be read, perhaps.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendments will be read.

After the word "agree," in line 13, page 8, add the words "and the provisions of this subdivision shall be embodied in every contract between the vessel owner or owners and the United States."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendments will be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I presume other Senators desire to discuss the bill. I do not wish to be heard at the present time on the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT (after a pause). The Chair lays before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently said: A moment ago the Chair referred the bill (H. R. 8997) to regulate the practice of pharmacy and the sale of poisons in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Inasmuch as the Senate committee has reported a bill (S. 2070) identical in terms with this bill, and it is Order of Business No. 802 on the Calendar, I ask that without referring the House bill to the Committee it be given the same place on the Calendar the Senate bill has, and that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

POTOMAC RIVER HIGHWAY BRIDGE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 23) providing for an extension of time for completing the highway bridge and approaches across the Potomac River at Washington, D. C.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate agree to the amendments made by the House of Representatives.

Mr. FRYE. What is the exact effect of the amendments?

Mr. GALLINGER. To shorten the time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read as amended by the House.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the time for completing the construction of the highway bridge and approaches across the Potomac River, authorized by section 12 of the act of Congress approved February 12, 1901, entitled "An act to provide for eliminating certain grade crossings on the line of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, in the city of Washington, D. C., and requiring said company to depress and elevate its tracks, and to enable it to relocate parts of its railroad therein, and for other purposes," as amended by the District of Columbia appropriation act, approved July 1, 1902, and as amended by "joint resolution providing for an extension of time for completing the highway bridge and approaches across the Potomac River, at Washington, D. C.," approved February 18, 1905, be, and is hereby, extended to December 15, 1906.

Mr. FRYE. I have no objection to the amendments.

DAMS AND POWER STATIONS AT MUSCLE SHOALS, ALABAMA.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the immediate consideration of the resolution which I will read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President is requested to return to the House of Representatives House bill 297, to authorize the construction of dams and power stations on the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals, Alabama, for the purpose of amendment.

That bill passed both Houses and went to the President. There is a difficulty in the draft of the bill which has challenged the attention of the President and raises in his mind an objection to the bill, which difficulty can be removed by amendment exactly in accordance with the purpose for which the bill was offered. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may now be considered.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That, the President is requested to return to the House of Representatives House bill 297, to authorize the construction of dams and power stations on the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals, Alabama, for the purpose of amendment.

Second. The total number of entries of land under each of the respective public-land laws under suspension on December 31, 1905, by reason of orders of suspension theretofore made by him or under his direction.

Third. The aggregate acreage embraced in the filings and entries aforesaid.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, unless some Senator is prepared to proceed with the discussion of the unfinished business——

Mr. TELLER rose.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Colorado rises. Perhaps he is prepared to go on.

Mr. TELLER. No, I am not.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Allow me to complete my sentence.

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about to suggest that the unfinished business might be temporarily laid aside and the Calendar be taken up until Senators are ready to go on with the discussion.

Mr. CULBERSON. I rise to that very question, Mr. President. As there seems to be a dearth of argument on this particular question of the subsidy and the value of this bill to the country, I have received a letter from a shipowner of Galveston, Tex., in which he discusses it somewhat fully. If there is no objection, I should be glad to have the letter printed in the RECORD to-morrow morning, so that all Senators can have the benefit of it before the vote is taken.

Mr. GALLINGER. There can be no objection to that, surely.

Mr. ALLISON. If it is an instructive letter, why not have it read as a part of the remarks of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CULBERSON. I was simply desiring to save time. It is a long letter and gives a good many figures and details. Each Senator can read it in the morning if he desires to do so. I have no objection personally to its being read.

Mr. ALLISON. The letter may be suggestive of other things. I think perhaps it is well enough to have it read.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be read by the Secretary. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

GALVESTON, TEX., February 10, 1906.

Hon. C. A. CULBERSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your favor of January 29, and also of a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 20, which contains Senator MALLORY'S speech on American merchant marine, in which he very much honors me by using some of the data which I sent to you at your request from the Raleigh Hotel during the first part of January.

As the matter is of utmost importance to our shipping, I trust you will kindly read also the following:

If I understand correctly, Senator MALLORY agrees that the payment of a retainer to the crew and a $5 per ton subvention proposition to the shipowner is insufficient for the purpose outlined in Senator GALLINGER'S bill, but the Senator from Florida says that if everything else be eliminated except the postal subsidy proposition he would like to have it passed to-morrow.

Paragraph No. 5 of the postal subsidy proposition provides as follows:

"From a port of the United States on the Gulf of Mexico to Cuba for steamships of the United States of not less than 14-knot speed for a semiweekly service at a maximum compensation not exceeding $75,000 per year."

I pick out this number, because it seems to be the nearest in which Florida and Texas are jointly interested, and would like to point out that the provision is either impractical of execution or fails of its purpose.

It requires a semiweekly service. To establish a semiweekly service that will cover the distance, say, between Habana and Mobile, which is the nearest trading line in the American-Cuban freight traffic, and which amounts to about 550 miles each way, at least two steamers are required.

Steamers making 14 knots speed on the trial trip, in actual navigation will average at the highest 12 knots, or 290 miles per day; consequently, about two days to make the voyage. A steamer requiring two days between port and port, as a matter of fact, will require two and one-half days between finishing loading and commencing discharging, because an additional night intervenes—i. e., a vessel leaving Mobile, say, on Sunday night, and requiring two days for travel to Habana, would not be available at the latter port for discharging until Wednesday morning, although it might have arrived at Habana on Tuesday night. That, therefore, means two and one-half days between ports, and then two and one-half days at sea for the return voyage gives five days at sea, to which must be added in summer time two and one-half days on account of the quarantine detention, as with yellow fever in Habana, as is actually the case now, the quarantine authorities will not admit a vessel during the summer without having been en route five days out from Habana.

We then have five days plus two and one-half days, or seven and one-half days, on the voyage, on a schedule that requires the steamer, in order to get the benefit of the postal subsidy, to make the round trip in seven days.

No provision, therefore, is made for the time required for loading and discharging, or, in other words, it is utterly impracticable to comply with the requirements of paragraph No. 5. At least, I should judge that it is not a business proposition to build steamers and take the chance of working them night and day all the time and always going without quarantine detention. I don't think Cuba has enough business power to employ three steamers from one Gulf port.

Steamers also have to be repaired occasionally, and hauled out and bottom painted, which would be impossible under the provision of paragraph No. 5—at least as far as a line from Mobile to Habana is concerned.

From New Orleans it would be still worse, and from Galveston utterly useless to spend any time figuring on it.

It might be possible between Key West and Habana, or, at the very outside, Port Tampa and Habana.

On the other hand, under paragraph No. 5, a concern can start two fast towboats running between an extreme southern Gulf port of Florida and an extreme north port of Cuba and claim the $75,000 subsidy, as long as a bona fide passenger and freight service from the larger Gulf ports to Cuba is not feasible under the terms of the Senator Gallinger bill.

There are at present running between American Gulf ports and Cuba the following lines:

1. Plant Line, from Key West and Tampa, which is American vessels that carry practically only passengers.
2. Munson-Habana Line, from Mobile, using one Cuban steamer for their freight service and one English steamer for passenger service.
3. Munson-North Side of Cuba, using two boats, Norwegian.
4. Munson-South Side of Cuba, using two boats, Norwegian.
5. Morgan Line, from New Orleans to Habana, running one American freight steamer and one English passenger steamer.
6. Commercial Union Navigation Company, of Habana, running one Norwegian freight steamer from Galveston.
7. Galveston Steamship Company, running one Norwegian freight steamer from Galveston to the north and south sides of Cuba.

There are consequently seven lines of steamers running from American Gulf ports to Cuba.

First. Now, why should the Government give $75,000 per year to develop American traffic between Gulf ports and Cuba?

Second. Would the payment of such a sum be sufficient if the Government requirements as now proposed were feasible?

Third. What would result if the payment of $75,000 would give a line of American steamers the control of the Cuban business?

In answer to the first, I believe that with seven lines already in existence there is no occasion for monetary support from the people of the United States, who are expected to vote in favor of this subvention, in order to establish means of communication between America and Cuba. At least that is the argument to the taxpayer, producer, and manufacturer.

In answer to the second, I consider that $75,000 per year for two 14-knot steamers would not offset the difference in cost and running expenses between an American vessel and a foreign vessel. An American steamer of this kind would probably cost $250,000; two of them, therefore, $500,000. The running expenses of these boats probably $175 per day, or two of them $350 per day, or a total running expense for the two steamers $127,775 per year. The Congressional investigation shows that the cost of running expenses of an American vessel as compared with a foreign vessel is about 33⅓ per cent larger, and calculating 33⅓ per cent on the cost and running expenses of the two steamers above referred to, and proportionately greater interest and insurance on cost of vessel and depreciation, and applying against the same the subvention of $75,000, it seems to me it is simply a question of calculation to convince shipowners that it is not good business to replace the foreign steamers now running in this trade with American vessels, particularly not if owners will take into consideration, as certainly they will, that the American boat can only be used in this one particular trade and is a dead loss should similar competition come up and force them out of business, or should business become for any reason so slack that the boats have to be employed in other unprotected deep-sea traffic, and then in competition with ships of foreign nations. Seventy-five thousand dollars applied to a semiweekly service that requires a dispatch 104 times a year means a subvention of only $73⅓ per trip, an amount so small that on a steamship proposition of this sort it has no bearing at all when the requirements of semiweekly service on the extremely limited time is taken into consideration. Seven hundred and thirty-one dollars per trip would not pay the extra expense of night work for two nights on a voyage, nor Sunday.

Answering the third: Assuming that all this calculation was in error, although I do not think it is, and assuming that $75,000 is given an American line and enables them to control the business, and further taking it for granted that the American line could overcome all other difficulties of time and insurmountable distance, and such an American line had such an advantage by reason of the $75,000 that it would drive all the remaining six lines out of business, and Galveston capital would happen to have the good luck of securing the subsidy, and no one else in the Gulf could fight the same, and Tampa, Pensacola, Mobile, and New Orleans would be driven out of the Cuban business. Then the movement would be restricted into Galveston, and feeling that we had the business grabbed, we would raise our rates to the maximum point possible and instead of giving the American farmer and producer, as now, seven lines to Cuba, all the traffic tributary to the Gulf, as far as Cuba is concerned, would have to come to Galveston; and I would like to be on the inside of the Galveston proposition.

If, on the other hand, Mobile or Tampa should get it, and Louisiana and Texas remain on the outside, why New Orleans and Galveston would simply not be in it.

It is my opinion that the Congressional investigation has fully discovered the cause that produced the decline in American merchant marine, but they have as yet not proposed a successful remedy (free ships and free crews) and that the mail subsidy, as now proposed, is insufficiently and wrongly applied.

There is a vast difference between subsidy to a Gulf line to Cuba when there are seven of them already in existence without it, and say, a steamship line between Hamburg and a German colony, or a route that must have the support of the Government not only for commercial but also for military purposes.

Speaking of Germany, I would also like to point out that German subsidies have failed to produce a general development of the German shipping, such as is in existence in England and Norway, and, as a matter of fact, the German subsidies have not produced anything but practically two large lines, who are, as a matter of fact, now dividing their territory so that they might not conflict with each other any more than absolutely necessary.

Senator MALLORY in the last part of his most interesting speech favors, as a remedy, a system of discriminating duties and believes that foreign retaliation on that score would be ineffective.

This proposition, without being now able to fully grasp its results, looks very inviting to me for the purpose of closer investigation, but the leading question that in my mind it involves is, What are you going to do with your ships enjoying the benefits of discriminating duties when business becomes slack by reason of crop failure or otherwise and in years of depression in American export and import trade? Will not we then be compelled to tie up our ships whilst foreign vessels are doing profitable business in other waters or between other continents where trade at the moment happens to be flourishing whilst it happens to be extremely slack and unprofitable on our shores?

I think we will be at a disadvantage.

If we had free ships and free crews we would never be at a disadvantage. We would always be on an equal basis with the balance of the world, and I think we then could take our chances with the balance.

Yours, very respectfully,

H. MOSLE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] has left the Chamber. I was about to ask that Senator whether he could give me any information concerning the author of this most remarkable letter, and as to whether or not he has any connection with a foreign steamship company. I do not know whether he has or not, but have a strong impression that he has such connections. The letter will go into the RECORD and the Senator can answer at his convenience. All I have to say about the letter is that it will have very careful consideration when I have an opportunity to see it in print.

The writer of this letter advocates free ships and free crews—absolute free trade in ships and free trade for men engaged in navigating ships, the reduction of the wages of American seamen and American officers to the wages paid by Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Norway, and other nations of the world. There is not a Senator, Mr. President, who would dare to vote for such a proposition to-day—not one. The Senator from Texas will not vote for it if it is submitted to him.

So far as free ships are concerned, I think that matter has been sufficiently discussed. It was very carefully inquired into by the Merchant Marine Commission, and no Senator or Member of the House of Representatives on that Commission, Republican or Democrat, advocated free ships, and there has been no suggestion in any report made to this body in favor of free ships. It simply means that if we purchase our ships abroad we utterly destroy our shipbuilding plants in the United States. We not only reduce the wages of our seamen, as is contemplated in this letter, by having free employment or having our navigation laws changed so that there is no benefit to accrue to American seaman, but we likewise destroy the possibility of American mechanics getting employment in the shipyards of this great country of ours.

As I said before, Mr. President, I will carefully examine the letter and have something further to say about it later on; but I want to now put in the RECORD the suggestion that it is the old, moss-grown, free-trade argument that to-day has very little place in our American economic system.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I suppose there is no man in either House who would not be glad to see some measure devised and enacted which would certainly operate to build up the merchant marine. I do not rise to make any set speech, but to call attention to some provisions of this bill which I think should be carefully scrutinized and as to which the Senator in charge of it can give some information. It is one of the most difficult subjects, so far as I have been able to consider it, which has been before Congress. There are various propositions, some of which, and the most popular, the Commission have, for apparently excellent reasons, felt constrained to reject. This is the best bill upon the subject in many respects that I have known anything of. There is a series of provisions in it for which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and, I presume, although I know nothing about it, other Senators on the other side of the Chamber would be quite willing to vote with this side, and that is to establish specified lines of steamships of requisite tonnage and speed power between the ports of the United States and ports of other countries with which we have some commerce and with which we desire very much more. That is a feasible, practical proposition, and one advantage in it is that, so far as the cost of it to the country is concerned, one can see the end from the beginning.

The cargo-bounty proposition is not offensive to me. I do not know how it will operate, but, so far as I know, it is an experiment in which I would be willing to invest something under restrictions and limitations which would leave Congress perfectly free in two years or five years to try it as an experiment, and to discontinue it if it shall be proven not to be successful, without subjecting the Government to a fairly well-founded charge of having held out inducements to men throughout the country to invest their money in ships upon the faith of a continuing bounty or subsidy, and then, the proposition having been accepted and money invested, of having in bad faith withdrawn it.

I particularly can not bring myself to like in this bill the provision in it for a naval reserve. I do not know where it originated. I do not quite know its concrete purpose. I can see, although I live in the interior and do not profess to know much about the sea or commerce by sea, a class to whom it would, beyond any possible question, be a concrete continuing benefit. I refer to the deep-sea fishermen, which I suppose includes the whalers, the sealers, the fisherman on the Grand Banks, and perhaps others.

Mr. BACON. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, yes.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he does not think, in case that principle should be recognized by us, that the practical operation of the bill ought to be extended, not only to fishermen on the Grand Banks, but also to fishermen on the Great Lakes and to fishermen, say, on this vast system known as the "Chesapeake Bay system," on which are engaged so many people? Why should they not be included?

Mr. SPOONER. I had not supposed that the fishermen on Chesapeake Bay were deep-sea fishermen.

Mr. BACON. I know they are not.

Mr. SPOONER. And I had supposed the object of this bill was to promote the construction of seagoing vessels and to create, as far as possible, a nursery or school for deep-sea sailors.

Mr. BACON. Yes; but that is not the point of my suggestion to the Senator. Of course we are seeking the promotion of seagoing vessels, and I suppose that object is one which would be as much advanced possibly in the manner I speak of as otherwise, unless it may be on the Great Lakes. They are quite large. The truth is the sailors engaged in fishing on the Great Lakes and on the waters of the Chesapeake Bay, for instance, have just as much to educate them in the matter of sea craft as those who go farther out, and I am inclined to think that they have to endure really greater hardships and greater dangers than those who go farther out to sea.

Mr. SPOONER. I doubt if that is true as to the Chesapeake Bay fishing. It may be so, but I am not sufficiently familiar with it to say.

Mr. BACON. I am not sufficiently informed to state it accurately, but they do have a great many hardships to undergo and a great many dangers to incur, and while they are within what you might call "landlocked" waters, still they are very large waters.

I was just asking the Senator—and I beg pardon for interrupting him—if that principle is to be recognized and put into practical operation, if we are to be restricted to the Grand Banks. I do not favor the system in either case, but I do not see why it should be extended to one and denied to another. For instance, I know on the coast of my own State there are a great many landlocked waters in which we have a considerable amount of shipping—small, it is true, but still shipping which instructs men in all the things that are necessary to make sailors—and men there undergo a great many dangers and hardships. I say I should not favor it in either instance, but I can not understand why it should be extended to one and denied to another.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me a moment, I would like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Georgia where in the bill he discovers the prohibition against seamen on the Great Lakes?

Mr. BACON. I do not know but possibly the Senator who drafted the bill may have intended to include the Great Lakes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly it does include them. There is no question about that.

Mr. BACON. I have no information which could determine that.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire consider that it includes the Great Lakes?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. Absolutely so.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire say that the naval reserve provision and the payments provided for thereunder apply to the Great Lakes?

Mr. GALLINGER. I so understand it.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly it does.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is very necessary it should include the Great Lakes if we are to get a naval reserve.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not so certain, Mr. President, that it does include them. This is a complicated system which is proposed to be put in operation, and one would suppose primarily the object of it is, from the manner in which it is drawn, to give a largess and a continuing bounty to the deep-sea fisheries. There might be controversy as to whether that is the primary purpose of it. It would undoubtedly be asserted by the Senator from New Hampshire and others who favor it that the primary purpose of it is to create a naval reserve upon which the Government may in time of stress depend for adequate skill with which to man our ships; but, to quote a phrase, it is inextricably intertwined with the provision for cargo bounty and tonnage bounty. Perhaps that is not to be avoided, but it has seemed to me, looking it over with some haste, that the interdependence between the naval-reserve provision and the other provisions would bring about a situation which would be almost intolerable and which would be calculated to defeat the purpose which it professes to have in view. The bill reads:

> That there shall be enrolled, in such manner and under such requirements as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, from the officers and men now and hereafter employed in the merchant marine and deep-sea fisheries of the United States.

I have thought that the phrase "merchant marine," as used there, did not include the Great Lakes.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it certainly does include all the vessels that sail on both oceans, the Great Lakes, on the Gulf, and in the coastwise trade. I understand that to be the meaning. If it is not I myself have made a mistake.

Mr. SPOONER. The object of this bill is not to encourage the coastwise trade, for that trade derives no benefit from it.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator says that is not the object, but that is the effect of the first section of this bill so far as those who are engaged in the coastwise trade are concerned—that is to say, they, as well as those engaged in deep-sea fisheries, receive this subvention.

Mr. SPOONER. Where does the Senator find anything in this bill which makes it clear to him that the Lake sailors are included?

Mr. ALLISON. The only thing that I can find in it is that it includes all persons who are in the merchant marine, and I am quite sure that all the vessels on the Great Lakes and everywhere on the seacoast, and those engaged in the coastwise trade, are included in this first provision. I have made inquiry about that from others who know more than I do in regard to this matter, and they said that that was the intent and purpose of this first section.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, there need be no controversy over this. As originally drafted, the provision was confined to those engaged in the foreign trade, but the Commission deliberately changed it so as to include the Great Lakes and the coastwise trade. We could not get a naval reserve unless we did that, and we will be very fortunate, indeed, if we get one, broadened as the provision is.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not so sure that we shall be so very fortunate if we get it, broadened as it is.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is a question of opinion.

Mr. SPOONER. That is a question for debate. I understand the term "merchant marine" may be used in a generic sense and be as broad as the Senator construes it, or it may be used in a more limited sense. Whether it is used in a particular measure in a generic sense or in a limited sense, we are to ascertain from looking upon it from every part of the measure. I was inclined to exclude it—at least to see the possibility if not the probability of its exclusion—because the merchant marine, so far as it concerns the Great Lakes, is to derive no benefit whatever from this legislation. They are to receive no bounty, as I understand, in time of peace. Does the Senator from Iowa understand differently?

Mr. ALLISON. I understand they receive the bounty provided by the first section for four years. They, of course, receive none of the bounty under the second section.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not speaking of sailors; I am speaking of vessels. Under the whole scheme of this bill there is no purpose evidenced in it to encourage by bounty the building of a single additional ship for navigation on the Great Lakes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly not, because on the Great Lakes——

Mr. SPOONER. I am not complaining of that.

Mr. GALLINGER. You can not complain of it, because foreign ships are absolutely prohibited by statute from engaging in that trade.

Mr. SPOONER. On the Great Lakes?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; they have got protection in every conceivable way.

Mr. HOPKINS. It is prohibition.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; it is prohibition.

Mr. SPOONER. Foreign ships would not engage very much in navigation on the Great Lakes without the prohibition, I apprehend.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not so sure about that. Canada is quite a country.

Mr. SPOONER. But let that go. I think the term "merchant marine," as found in the first section, construed with reference to the entire structure of the bill and the object of the bill, leaves it in doubt as to whether the broader or the narrower construction should be placed upon it in connection with the Great Lakes and the deep-sea fisheries.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, if he desires an amendment to that provision, those of us who are advocating this bill have no objection to having it read "including the Great Lakes and the coastwise trade." That is what we are aiming at.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator thinks this naval-reserve provision is wise, I think that amendment ought to be made.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection.

Mr. SPOONER. If it is not a wise provision, it is inconsequential whether it is made or not. It is this particular phase of it about which I intended to briefly address the Senate. I will begin again, for I want to analyze this provision.

That there shall be enrolled, in such manner and under such requirements as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, from the officers and men now and hereafter employed in the merchant marine and deep-sea fisheries of the United States, such officers, petty officers, and men as may be capable of rendering service as members of a naval reserve, for duty in time of war—

There is no definition of "eligibility." I suppose that is to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. GALLINGER. By regulation.

Mr. SPOONER (reading):

for duty in time of war, and who are willing to undertake such service, to be classified in grades and ratings according to their capacity as shown at time of enrollment. No man shall be thus enrolled who is not a citizen of the United States either by birth or naturalization. These members of the Naval Reserve shall be enrolled for a period of four years, during which period they shall be subject to render service on call of the President in time of war.

That, I suppose, involves an enlistment in the Naval Reserve. Is not that the understanding of the Senator?

Mr. GALLINGER. A voluntary enrollment.

Mr. SPOONER. Where comes in the compulsory element, then? They are to be paid. They are to be under the control and discipline of the Navy Department. Is it a mere simple contract from which they are to be at liberty to depart whenever they have received as much of this bounty as they desire, or when they may secure more profitable employment elsewhere? Is it intended that there shall be no binding force in this enrollment? If that is the theory of the provision, it is simply, in the last analysis of it, a scheme, so far as the sailors not connected with the deep-sea fisheries are concerned, to shovel money out of the Treasury into the hands of numerous citizens who are not bound by any enlistment paper or any contract to render service to the Government for it in time of war unless they choose.

I had supposed on reading this clause for a naval reserve that as a condition precedent to the payment of these retainers, as they are denominated in that portion of the measure, the men assumed some obligation in consideration of those payments to serve the Government if called upon by the President in time of war.

Mr. HOPKINS. I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that if the bill is deceptive in that particular, why not present an amendment covering the very point he suggests?

Mr. SPOONER. I am trying to ascertain what the bill means. If it does not mean what I thought it did, that a man is to bind himself to serve this Government if called upon during the four years, then it is fatally defective; it is child's play; it is a prodigal waste of money.

Mr. HOPKINS. The reason I made a suggestion was that if the bill does not require the service——

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator in charge of the bill says it does not.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not mean to say it exactly in that form. I do not know exactly what the requirements of the Navy Department may be in the event of these men offering themselves for enrollment. I only know that the British naval reserve is along precisely the lines of this provision. I know furthermore that this particular provision was prepared by the naval board, they thinking it preferable to the provision originally in the bill.

Now, the provision in question says this——

Mr. HOPKINS. What page?

Mr. GALLINGER. Page 3. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to this point: These men, in the first place, have to be willing. They are not coerced.

Mr. SPOONER. I fear they are coerced somewhat.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will have great difficulty in doing that, with all his great ability.

Mr. SPOONER. Possibly.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are to be enrolled under provisions and regulations to which they subscribe. How far, after they have accepted that service and have become enrolled members of the Naval Reserve, the Government can lay its hands on them afterwards, I am not prepared to say. But I think it would be adequate. I think the Government would have full power to compel these men to fulfill the obligation they entered into when they became enrolled members of the Naval Reserve.

Mr. SPOONER. The truth is, as I think is obvious from a more careful reading of the bill, that the Senator from New Hampshire misconstrues it when he indicates the opinion that it does not involve an enlistment, a binding obligation to serve at any time during the four years upon the command of the President.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that that is exactly what I said—that, in my judgment, they were so bound.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. They can be compelled to serve.

Mr. SPOONER. You say that now.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, a little while ago you thought otherwise.

Mr. GALLINGER. I spoke inadvertently, perhaps, or I did not understand the Senator's question. I said they could not be compelled to enlist.

Mr. SPOONER. They can not be compelled to enlist, but they are induced to enlist by the offer of this bounty, or "retainer," as it is called in the bill. The bill has strong language. It says:

These members of the Naval Reserve shall be enrolled for a period of four years, during which period they shall be subject to render service on call of the President in time of war.

Of course that involves an enlistment and an obligation, and it ought to be so. I should like to ask the Senator whether this provision involves an obligation that he reenlist?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think not. I do not know that it does. There is no obligation for a soldier to reenlist in the service of the United States Army. I do not know why this provision should include reenlistment.

Mr. SPOONER. The men are to receive this bounty during the four years, and at the expiration of the four years they are at liberty to decline to be reenrolled.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so.

Mr. SPOONER (reading):

They shall also possess such qualifications, receive such instruction, and be subject to such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe.

That characterizes an enlistment, a service to which one has bound himself.

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, upon proper audit, to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to each officer, petty officer, or man thus enrolled and employed in the merchant marine or deep-sea fisheries, as hereinafter provided, an annual retainer as follows: For each officer of the line or Engineer Corps, having the rank of lieutenant of the Naval Reserve, $110; for each officer of the line or Engineer Corps, having the rank of lieutenant (junior grade) in the Naval Reserve, $90; for each officer of the line or Engineer Corps, having the rank of ensign in the Naval Reserve, $80; for each man with a rating of chief petty officer, $70; for each man with a rating of petty officer, first class, $60; for each man with a rating of petty officer, second class, $48; for each man with a rating of petty officer, third class, $40—for each seaman, first class, $36; for each seaman, second class, $30; for each seaman, third class, $24.

There they are classified, beginning with a hundred and ten dollars, which is the highest, and going to $24, which is the lowest.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me right in this connection to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question for information?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. It is as to the number of men, so far as can be ascertained, at present engaged in service who will be entitled to this compensation. I refer to the number of petty officers and seamen who are engaged in the deep-sea fisheries. Has the Senator any information on that subject?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not the information at hand, but will supply it later on.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Georgia must not limit it to the deep-sea fisheries. It is contended here that it applies to the merchant marine generally throughout the United States, including the coastwise trade. So the basis upon which this payment is to be made, or rather the field from which these voluntary enlistments are to be made, embraces the Great Lakes, the coastwise trade, the deep-sea fisheries, and the merchant marine of the United States engaged in the foreign service; and that of course——

Mr. BACON. The reason I limited the question to the deep-sea fisheries is that the merchant marine is comparatively undeveloped at present, whereas there are a number engaged in the deep-sea fisheries, and I did not know but that the Senator from New Hampshire had the statistics on the subject. Of course, the question of the number who will be engaged in the merchant marine is one of some uncertainty, so far as the question of the effect of this bill may be uncertain in the development of the merchant marine. I thought that the deep-sea fisheries being now something developed, probably very nearly to the limit which it will attain subsequently, the Senator might have the information. But I see the force of the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. The merchant marine is pretty well developed in respect to the coastwise trade——

Mr. BACON. So far as concerns the coastwise trade the Senator is correct.

Mr. SPOONER. And the Great Lakes.

Mr. HEYBURN. In view of the remark of the Senator from Wisconsin that possibly there is some room for doubt as to whether the word "marine" includes vessels on the Great Lakes, I suggest that after the word "marine," in line 21, the words "Great Lakes" be inserted. I find upon some investigation that the term "marine" applies exclusively to the high seas, except where by statutory enactment a like jurisdiction has been extended over the Great Lakes. If it will not interfere with the Senator's statement of the matter, I would suggest that amendment—after the word "marine," in line 21, on page 3, to insert the words "Great Lakes."

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to ask the Senator from Idaho a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. I suggest to the Senator from Idaho that he move to strike out the words "deep-sea fisheries" and insert "fisheries of the United States."

Mr. HEYBURN. I can not hear the Senator.

Mr. DANIEL. Would it not tend to accomplish the purpose of the Senator to strike out the word "deep-sea" and leave it "the fisheries of the United States?" [After a pause.] I hardly think, on reflection, that it would. It would be a separate proposition. So I will not detain the Senate with it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I only intended to remove any doubt that might exist as to whether the word "marine" would include the Great Lakes by inserting the words "Great Lakes," and I shall ask that that amendment be considered at the proper time.

Mr. SPOONER. It will be observed, Mr. President, that there is no limitation whatever upon the number of men who are to be paid this annual retainer, and from the structure of the provision generally, I think almost every eligible man on the Great Lakes, on the rivers, in the coasting trade, or anywhere else will be quite likely to avail himself of the provisions of the act.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will observe that there is one very important restriction, and that is that they shall be citizens of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Or naturalized.

Mr. GALLINGER. Or naturalized. That makes them citizens.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly; but that is a very easy——

Mr. GALLINGER. But——

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire wish to proceed?

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about to say that at the proper time I would show, I think, by actual facts that we will not be overburdened by American citizens, either by birth or naturalization, for this reserve from our complement of sailors.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, let us see what the probabilities are about that. I do not think the Senator can show very definitely from actual facts what will happen in the future.

Mr. GALLINGER. Nobody can.

Mr. SPOONER. Nobody can. Therefore the Senator can not. Now, take the bill—

Such retainer shall be paid at the end of each year of service—on certificate, by an officer to be designated by the Secretary of the Navy, that the member of the Naval Reserve has satisfactorily complied with the regulations.

Upon what?

Now, that is right enough, because the officer designated by the Secretary of the Navy will be aware of the fact as to the conduct of the man as a member of the Naval Reserve. Then what follows?

and on certificate by the Commissioner of Navigation—

Upon what can the Commissioner of Navigation base his certificate? What is he to certify? He is to certify—that such member has served satisfactorily for at least six months of the preceding twelve months on vessels of the United States in the merchant marine or in the deep-sea fisheries.

It goes without saying that the Commissioner of Navigation will have no personal knowledge whatever of the fact concerning which he is to make certificate. He must base his certificate on somebody else's certificate, must he not?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator just here—I do not know that it will make any difference in his argument—that it is the purpose to change that to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, who is at the head of the Department.

Mr. SPOONER. That makes it no better.

Mr. GALLINGER. Prior to this certificate there is a certification that is very accurate, and if there is a duplication of certification it will do no harm.

Mr. SPOONER. Here is what troubles me about it. So far as concerns the condition precedent growing out of the certificate of the naval officer, that takes care of itself. But whether the member of the Naval Reserve has served six months at sea satisfactorily or not is a matter which neither the Commissioner of Navigation nor the Secretary of Commerce and Labor can certify except upon information received from some one else. From whom? From the master of the ship under whom the sailor served; certainly from some officer of the ship under whose eye he has worked.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I think he is altogether too technical.

Mr. SPOONER. That is not technical.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the certificate is not satisfactory, the man will not get his pay.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. So no harm is done.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; harm may be done to the sailor, but what a control, if I am right, it gives the master of a ship over this member of the Naval Reserve. The master of the ship or the shipowner may reduce the wages which would otherwise be paid to the sailor by the amount of this bounty proposed to be taken out of the Treasury to pay him as a member of the Naval Reserve.

Mr. GALLINGER. My answer to that is that it is improbable.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, my answer to that is that it is entirely probable. So far as I have been able to discover, in all of these bills there has been given tremendous attention to the building of ships, to the multiplication of ships (and our legislation generally bears evidence of that), and but very little attention to the comfort of or justice to the men who navigate ships.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Wisconsin is entirely inaccurate in his statement.

Mr. SPOONER. In what respect?

Mr. FRYE. Legislation has been passed ever since I have been in Congress favoring the sailors. There have been increased dimensions for them on shipboard and increased comforts on shipboard. There is a regular menu established for their provision, and all that sort of thing, and the sailors have up to this time made no complaint. Most of the legislation reported from the Committee on Commerce has been in the interest of the sailors rather than of the shipowners.

Mr. SPOONER. A year ago, or at the last session, a bill passed the Senate and was amended in the Senate having reference to the manning of ships and the efficiency of the deck crew on ships. That bill died on the table in the House of Representatives. I believe it died on the table of the House of Representatives because the Senate had incorporated in it an amendment which was intended to throw around the deck crew of the ship safeguards absolutely obvious to those who have solicitude either for passengers or for crew. I will read it:

Provided, That except in the case of steamers navigating rivers exclusively, at least 75 per cent of the navigating crew, exclusive of licensed officers, shall be individually effective hands.

That does not define itself. But the Senate amendment explained it:

That is, of a rating not less than able seaman, and no one shall be signed as an able seaman unless he shall be 19 or more years of age and shall have served at least three years on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes.

The provision in this bill, and it contains a definition, is:

That upon each departure of said vessel from the United States at least one-sixth of the crew shall be citizens of the United States, or men who have declared their intention to become citizens, and of the deck force—

The deck or navigating force, the men who in time of stress of danger are the safeguards of the ship and its human frieght—excluding licensed officers, at least one-half shall be able seamen, who are hereby defined to be men who have had two years or more experience at sea on deck.

This matter of undermanning a ship, of not having the requisite number of able seamen—and when I say able seamen I mean men who reach up to a standard, which in the world is deemed requisite, in the way of experience, proved courage, knowledge of navigation, the dangers which confront a crew on an ocean-going vessel—is not simply of importance to the owner of the ship, nor simply of importance to the passengers on the ship, to the great mass of waiters on the ship, to the men who are of no avail in time of accident, except to make a rush for the boat; but it is important to the crew, it is important to the men who are fit to be in the deck crew. They are all interested in that. If they are surrounded by an unjust proportion of men very much less efficient than themselves, it involves overwork upon their part, and not simply overwork, but it involves danger to them as it does to the ship.

It does not rest simply on the statement of the seamen's unions; it does not rest simply on the statement of those who go down to the sea in ships, and who have banded together, as all other men who work have banded together to promote in fair ways the interest and the safety of their craft. The importance of this matter of manning and of absolute efficiency in the crew on deck has received the attention of Parliament in Great Britain. It was thoroughly investigated. The reports show that very little testimony could be secured from the masters of ships or the owners of ships. The testimony came mainly from men who manned the ships.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator refer to the testimony taken by the Merchant Marine Commission?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know whether it is the Merchant Marine Commission or not.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was; and if the Senator will read the testimony, he will see that seamen were called at every port which the Commission visited and were given hearings by the hour.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not talking about your Commission.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, I beg pardon.

Mr. SPOONER. I am speaking of the English commission.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I will say to him right here, if he will permit me, that the Merchant Marine Commission, which formulated this bill, gave hearings to seamen in every port which it visited, and it listened attentively and patiently to them hour after hour, and endeavored in formulating the bill to do them no harm.

Mr. SPOONER. Did the Commission learn of nothing that could be reasonably desired by the sailors in the construction of this bill, involving $40,000,000 expenditure?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Commission did not discover that there were any very profound grievances on the part of the sailors.

Mr. SPOONER. Were there any?

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume so.

Mr. SPOONER. Are they remedied in this bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. This bill is not a panacea for all the ills of the world.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; but——

Mr. SPOONER. But if we are to embark upon the experiment of building up the merchant marine and the Naval Reserve, it is part of our duty to make the seafaring life as attractive as it was once; to give attention to ships, and none the less to the men who man them.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator what provision he would insert in this bill which would tend to make seafaring life an attractive one?

Mr. SPOONER. For this loose provision of the bill—

That upon each departure of said vessel from the United States at least one-sixth of the crew shall be citizens of the United States, or men who have declared their intention to become citizens, and of the deck force, excluding licensed officers, at least one-half shall be able seamen, who are hereby defined to be men who have had two years or more experience at sea on deck—

I would substitute a larger percentage of able seamen.

Mr. GALLINGER. Americans?

Mr. SPOONER. Of Americans. I would require them to have had a longer experience at sea, and I would not close the door either, as this bill has closed it, as the Senate did not close it on another occasion, on the sailors from the Great Lakes.

Mr. GALLINGER. This bill does not close it on the sailors on the Great Lakes.

Mr. SPOONER. Let us see whether it does or not.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if he is aware of the fact that on the Pacific coast only 5 per cent are American seamen?

Mr. SPOONER. I am aware of that fact.

Mr. GALLINGER. How are you going to increase the proportion if you have not the men?

Mr. SPOONER. We can get the men, I suppose. You expect by this bill to get the men.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope so, but we will not have them at the start.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator says the men on the Great Lakes are not excluded. I read from the bill:

Able seamen, who are hereby defined to be men who have had two years or more experience at sea on deck.

"At sea on deck." Does that leave any room for the splendid sailors on the Great Lakes?

Mr. GALLINGER. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. SPOONER. I am reading from page 8 of the bill, subdivision 3.

Mr. GALLINGER. That has nothing to do with the Naval Reserve.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not talking about the Naval Reserve. I am not through with that, but I passed from it to this other proposition. I will go back to the Naval Reserve. If there had been a decent number of efficient men on the General Slocum, there would have been infinitely less loss of life, if any, and it is not good legislation nor is it good administration that renders it possible for shipowners to gather in dollars from men, women, and children without taking the precautions reasonably to be prescribed by law to have their ships manned by men who know the sea and who know what to do in an emergency, and have the courage to do it. I came across the ocean once on a great steamship with my family when the crew of able-bodied seamen had been taken off at night on a strike and their places filled by men picked from the slums of Liverpool, and there were not ten able seamen on the ship. Happily it was a smooth voyage; but no ship with hundreds of people ever ought to be permitted, Mr. President, to leave port to start upon an ocean voyage unless there are upon that ship the requisite number of seamen of experience.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to have the Senator define what he means by deck force.

Mr. SPOONER. It does not mean the cabin, of course.

Mr. FRYE. Is the Senator sure? Does it mean the waiters, and all that sort of thing?

Mr. SPOONER. Does it mean the waiters?

Mr. FRYE. In my opinion it does, and by the Senator's requirement of 75 per cent of able-bodied seamen there is no passenger ship on the Lakes that could run.

Mr. SPOONER. If the bill in its provision about able-bodied seamen includes the great army of waiters and the cooks and the laundrymen and the stewards, it is for the interest of the people of the United States not to pay out any money for the construction of additional vessels.

Mr. FRYE. The language of the bill is "able-bodied seamen." The language the Senator uses is "deck force," which is a totally different thing, as I understand it.

Mr. SPOONER. I read it from the bill. It says:

That upon each departure of said vessel from the United States at least one-sixth of the crew shall be citizens of the United States—

I understand the word "crew" to be a generic word and to take in all the employees of the ship—or men who have declared their intention to become citizens, and of the deck force, excluding licensed officers, at least one-half shall be able seamen.

I did not understand that to be applicable to the waiters.

Mr. LODGE. I do not understand it, either.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Maine seems to understand it that way.

Mr. FRYE. It does.

Mr. SPOONER. It does? Then there may be, in compliance with the law, no sailors of experience on the deck provided that among the waiters and stewards there are some able seamen who have served at sea two years on deck. Is that what it means?

Mr. GALLINGER. As the Senator addresses himself to me——

Mr. SPOONER. I address myself to anybody.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say that I do not agree with the Senator from Maine, although he may be right, that it includes waiters, cooks, etc.

Mr. FRYE. I did not say that it included cooks, etc.

Mr. SPOONER. Waiters.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understood the Senator to say that it included waiters and cooks.

Mr. FRYE. I did not.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say in reply——

Mr. FRYE. I did not say it included cooks and laundrymen, but the Senator from Wisconsin went on to enumerate them.

Mr. SPOONER. Why should it not include stewards if it includes waiters?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say on that point, the only difficulty those of us who tried to construct a reasonable bill encountered in this direction was the protest that it would be impossible under certain conditions to get even one-sixth of the crew Americans, and I think on the Pacific coast it will be an extremely difficult matter to do.

I want to add, Mr. President, that this bill for the first time, I think, has prohibitions of that kind; that we are making restrictions in this bill much more severe than have heretofore been made in the matter of having trained men on shipboard who can take care of ships in a case of emergency. We can not have one-half the crew Americans if it is impossible to get them. We can not have one-half the crew able seamen if they do not exist. The Commission investigated this matter with the utmost thoroughness and came to a deliberate conclusion. This is not any guesswork; it is not any haphazard legislation that is proposed. Of course it is subject to criticism, but some of the criticism that the Senator is indulging in I think is not quite fair.

Mr. SPOONER. If it is not fair I should regret it. I have no motive on earth to make an unjust criticism upon the bill. But I believe that every interest from the standpoint of humanity and every interest from the standpoint of making sea life attractive again ought to lead the Senate in enacting legislation of this sort to look out for the interest of the sailor——

Mr. GALLINGER. I quite agree with the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. And the passenger. It ought not to be left open to debate as to what constitutes a navigating crew or deck force as contradistinguished from the waiters and the stewards.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me on that point, I should like to read a paragraph from the report of the Commission, which was charged with this duty:

Authorized representatives of the seamen have been heard by the Commission on the Atlantic, the Pacific, and the Gulf of Mexico. They have had a conspicuous part in almost every meeting, and their evidence is fully set forth in the published volumes. As a rule, this testimony is to the effect that general conditions of life in the American merchant marine—wages, food, quarters, etc.—are superior to those in foreign services, but that the discipline is often more exacting and the work more arduous. These seamen witnesses frankly acknowledge the beneficial effect of legislation enacted in recent years by Congress, but they ask for further measures of relief. The Commission would, therefore, commend to the friendly attention of the proper committees—

The Commission did not feel that this bill was the proper place for these remedial measures.

The Commission would, therefore, commend to the friendly attention of the proper committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives requests offered by the sailors as to the load-line law, the adequate manning of seagoing ships, imprisonment for desertion in foreign ports, and certain standard qualifications of seamen.

The Commission recommended to the proper committees of Congress the consideration of these measures which did not properly belong and which could not well be incorporated in a law of this kind.

Mr. SPOONER. Why did the Commission take so much testimony all over the country if they were so obviously without the purview of the Commission's action?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Commission were very much gratified to find that even the wildest foreign seamen, and there are a great many of them in this country as wild as hawks, admitted that our legislation was beneficial, and that they were receiving better, far betteer, quarters and better treatment in every way than were given to seamen on foreign ships. That was a great gratification to the Commission.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask the consideration of the Senator who has the bill in charge of an amendment in the twenty-fourth line on page 8, which shall admit in the definition of "an able seaman" men who have served three years on deck on the Great Lakes, where the navigation is quite dangerous, if not more dangerous, than it is at sea, and where the skill required in the handling of a ship is of as great utility on the lake as it would be on the ocean. That provision was in the bill which passed the Senate, and I read it a little while ago.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think there can be no objection to that. I have that impression. I will look it over.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, I will go back—and I want to be through—to the Naval Reserve. When I left that subject I was asking the Senator from New Hampshire upon what evidence of satisfactory service for six months by the naval-reserve men the Commissioner of Navigation is to certify?

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I will read six lines from the existing law.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well.

Mr. GALLINGER. I read from the postal-aid law of 1891:

SEC. 8. That said vessels shall take, as cadets or apprentices, one American-born boy under 21 years of age for each 1,000 tons gross register, and one for each majority fraction thereof, who shall be educated in the duties of seamanship, rank as petty officers, and receive such pay for their services as may be reasonable.

Now, in some way the Navy Department, without the provision even that we have in this bill, gets that information. I presume they get it from the commanders of the vessels; I do not know.

Mr. SPOONER. All that has to be certified is that the apprentice was on the ship and made the voyage.

Mr. GALLINGER. Exactly; and he gets his pay for it.

Mr. SPOONER. The law requires no certificate as to the character of service, does it?

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, yes; he has got to be trained in seamanship.

Mr. SPOONER. He is being instructed in seamanship; that is all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; but the point that I make is that if we can not trust somebody to make a fair return of the naval reserve men, certainly we ought not to trust them to make a fair return of those boys; but we do trust somebody under existing law.

Mr. SPOONER. The certificate has got to be that such a person has served satisfactorily—that can only be determined by some one on board the ship—for at least six months of the preceding twelve months on vessels of the United States in the merchant marine or in the deep-sea fisheries, and if the captain of the ship does not certify that the person served satisfactorily for that period it is incompetent for the officers of the Government to pay to that man the retainer. Now, what greater power could be given over a sailor's ability—I do not phrase that happily—to secure this retainer than is provided here as to the evidence upon which it is to be paid?

Suppose the captain of the ship or the owner insists upon paying less wages because of this payment by the Government, is it not entirely within his power under such a procedure as that to enforce it? If a mean captain, a tyrannical captain, a captain who has been prejudiced by mates against a sailor or in anywise does not see fit to make this certificate, is there any manner in which justice can be brought about?

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, the captain has precisely the same authority over these boys under existing law if he is a mean captain and has mean mates and they want to punish a boy or deprive him——

Mr. SPOONER. That is a small matter, and this is a large one.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the principle is the same, whether big or little.

Mr. SPOONER. That deals with a few boys, and this is expected to deal with thousands of men.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope so.

Mr. SPOONER. And the more it deals with the better it will suit.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator right there if he will be kind enough to indicate a different process from what is provided in the bill on that point?

Mr. SPOONER. If I do not, and this is a serious defect in the bill, as I think it is, it looks as if there is something the matter with the plan.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator to suggest a better plan.

Mr. SPOONER. I can not.

Mr. GALLINGER. If we can not get anything better——

Mr. SPOONER. I suppose it must be based upon the certificate of the captain. Now, when you come to require a man to join the Naval Reserve in order to get employment on ships, as in some degree this bill does, it gets to be very material.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will allow me right there, there is no inhibition for these men to get employment in the service of the Navy or of the merchant marine.

Mr. SPOONER. What men?

Mr. GALLINGER. These naval-reserve men.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. They need not join the Naval Reserve. That is the only inhibition.

Mr. SPOONER. But certainly some of the men on these bounty-paid ships must be of the Naval Reserve.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. And that in a constantly increasing number up to one-fourth. If the captain of a ship sees fit to deprive a sailor of this bounty from the Government, he may be able to keep him from getting employment in the merchant marine at all. Now, what follows, Mr. President? Here is a peculiar proposition. Here is a six-months' service. I suppose that is intended to refer particularly to the deep-sea fisheries. This takes care of itself.

Then this:

Each officer, petty officer, or man of the Naval Reserve thus enrolled, who has not served for six months of the preceding year on vessels of the United States in the merchant marine or in the deep-sea fisheries, but has complied with the other prescribed requirements for enrollment in the Naval Reserve, shall receive one-half the annual retainer as enumerated above.

That is, from $110 down to $24. He need not have served a day at sea on a ship during the year.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is explainable, if the Senator will permit me. That is not a provision I am at all insistent upon. It is a provision that was placed there at the earnest solicitation of the Navy Department, and their purpose is that men who have served in the United States Navy, but who are not now in the service, might come in under that provision. They have had their experience, and they would be very valuable men in time of need. It will not take a great many. They conform to all the requirements of the statute except the one matter of having been six months at sea, they having been perhaps ten years at sea formerly. That is what that is intended to cover. I do not care whether it remains in the bill or not.

Mr. SPOONER. Every able-bodied seaman in the United States of proper age and citizenship could enroll himself in that reserve and without going to sea at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Provided——

Mr. SPOONER. He could be engaged in other business——

Mr. GALLINGER. Provided he had served as a seaman and is acceptable to the Navy Department.

Mr. SPOONER. And draw one-half of this bounty from the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. American seamen on land are not very numerous, I will say to the Senator. There are very few of them.

Mr. SPOONER. I construe it correctly, then?

Mr. GALLINGER. You do.

Mr. SPOONER. That is the purpose?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the purpose, and the provision was inserted at the earnest solicitation of the Navy Department.

Mr. SPOONER. The Navy Department earnestly solicits a good many things that Congress does not do and ought not to do.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is right.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think a man who has been in the Navy and has experienced the supreme difficulty of getting out, no matter what the exigency or situation may be at home, would put himself in a position where he could be tolled in again for this little pay under existing regulations.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then it will do no harm.

Mr. SPOONER. But it would not be confined to those people. It is not confined to those people. Any man in the United States who has served, after this amendment or, as the Senator construes it now, in the coastwise marine or merchant marine on the Lakes—perhaps the merchant marine on the rivers—and is otherwise qualified, may enroll himself; and while those who have spent six months at sea get the full pay those who do not spend an hour at sea get the half pay. There is an indefiniteness of generosity about that that is inexpressible. It compares rather unfavorably with the tenderness and considerateness with which, as I view it, both the bill and the law have treated the men upon whose fealty and courage and skill the ships and their passengers and crew and freight depend.

Here is the sixth subdivision of section 3. We get the connection here between this naval reserve and the payment of this bounty.

Sixth. A vessel shall not be entitled to the subvention above provided for, unless during the period of employment in the foreign trade or deep-sea fisheries the following proportions of the crew of the vessel after the dates specified shall have been enrolled in the naval reserve: After July 1, 1908, one-eighth; after July 1, 1912, one-sixth; after July 1, 1917, one-fourth.

In section 7 also it is provided:

That all contracts hereafter made pursuant to the act of March 3, 1891, before mentioned, or pursuant to sections 5 and 6 of this act, shall provide that on each voyage the following proportion of the crew shall be enrolled in the naval reserve: After July 1, 1908, one-eighth; after July 1, 1912, one-sixth; and after July 1, 1917, one-fourth.

A man, Mr. President, who is willing to be put in that duress, who, in order to secure employment in his calling on a ship at sea will bind himself in time of peace to serve four years whenever called upon in time of war, to get this money out of the Treasury, is not the kind of a man to be relied upon for national defense in time of war. Good sailors, self-respecting sailors abhor it. They say that it is an insult. They say it is a governmental tip, and is predicated upon the false assumption that they do not love the flag which floats over the ship upon which they sail out on the sea; that their patriotism is to be bought by this bounty from the Treasury, and that the people of the United States and its Government are not looking to the past and the prompt enlistment of sailors in the past in time of trouble, willing to trust to their patriotism.

The idea—and some would have to do that in order to get employment in the merchant marine—that a man must enlist, must take this pay which he does not earn, perchance simply paid for the right to call upon him any time during four years if the exigency demands it, and that he must enter upon that obligation in order to obtain service on one of these bounty-paid ships, is repulsive. It is a new way of building up or making a recruiting establishment for the Navy. The sailors say it is a governmental press gang after a fashion, and they do not like it.

I will not take the time to read them, for I want to yield to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], but I will ask permission to put in the RECORD one or two resolutions of sailors' organizations protesting against this provision.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolutions referred to are as follows:

Lake Seamen's Union resolution.

Whereas the United States Senate is about to vote upon the subsidy bill: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Lake Seamen's Union, in meeting assembled, That we respectfully but earnestly protest against the bill in its present form, and appeal to the Senate to strike out subsections 3 and 6 of section 3, for the following reasons:

First. Subsection 3 appears to give some advantage to the seaman, but in reality lowers the standard of efficiency by authorizing the vessel to go to sea with but half of the crew able seamen. They have done so in the past, but in violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the law.

Second. Subsection 6 provides that the owner must have a certain number of naval reserves to get the subsidy. This means that the seaman must be in the reserves in order to get employment. This is conscription pure and simple, and we protest against being selected for this while other men may, under ordinary conditions, choose whether they will enlist or not until the nation needs all its men.

Third. It would compel us to be in the military service from 21 to 47 or quit the sea.

Fourth. Under such conditions we would rather quit the sea, since it would be a notice to us that we must, as seamen, give up any hope of improvement in our life. We have asked for laws in accord with American ideas, and we are getting more servitude and more discriminations against us.

Fifth. The discrimination is coupled with a bonus, which places us in the position of receiving, while in health, money which we have not earned, and which is therefore in the eyes of honest men dishonorable.

Sixth. The striking out of these two sections leaves it to each seaman to choose for himself whether he will accept the bonus or not, and this, we respectfully suggest, is a privilege granted to all other servants. As workingmen we ask to be permitted to retain so much of the respect of our fellows and ourselves as our present status has made it possible for us to keep.

On behalf of the Lake Seamen's Union.

CHICAGO, ILL., February 9, 1906.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 10, 1906.

DEAR SENATOR: On behalf of the seamen I hereby respectfully and earnestly protest against the adoption of the subsidy bill as now before the Senate. The protest is based upon the following reasons:

1. Section 1 offers to us a bonus, for which we never asked and against which we most emphatically protest. When this country needed men we always volunteered, and Congress has no right to assume that we will do otherwise in the future.

2. The same section puts us under the absolute authority of the Secretary of the Navy to "receive such instructions and be subject to such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe." To refuse would mean punishment for desertion under the naval regulation.

3. The bonus shall only be paid on condition that we have served in some private vessel to the satisfaction of the owner thereof for six months or more during the previous twelve months. The bonus shall be paid "on certificate by the Commissioner of Navigation that such member has served satisfactorily for at least six months * * * on some merchant vessel of the United States." None but the owner of the vessel can give such certificate.

4. Subsection 6 of section 3 and section 7 provide that the owners are not to receive the subsidy unless they employ in their vessels an increasingly large number of members of the naval reserve. This makes industrial employment contingent upon enlistment in the Navy, and is a more drastic form of conscription than is now practiced by any country.

5. This bill makes the seamen's bread dependent upon service in the Navy not only during war, but during peace as well.

6. The seamen may not, under this bill, choose for himself whether he shall volunteer; he must or else he must leave the sea.

7. He can not, like an honest man, refuse to accept money which he has not earned. He must either so behave himself as to fail in getting a certificate of good conduct, he must leave the calling, or he must accept, no matter if what self-respect he may possess is thereby wounded or destroyed.

8. He must at all times be ready to go to war upon the call of the President against anybody in any cause for anybody. He may not, like a citizen may, refuse to serve until the President shall by the need of the country deem it proper to call upon all men in the country's defense.

9. The industrial employer could, and, as we know him, we know that he would reduce the present all too low wages by so much as the Government would be paying. To dispute his right to determine the rate of wages would be to fail in getting that certificate of good conduct necessary to get this bonus. Real seamen will without doubt fail.

11. Seamen are too ill paid and poor to live like other men, but we have yet, in spite of our status under the law and the pity with which we are considered, sufficient self-respect to appreciate the true value of the gift which it is contemplated to force upon us.

On behalf of the organized seamen of the United States.

Very truly, yours,

ANDREW FURUSETH,
Chairman Legislative Committee.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator yield to me one moment?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. The deck crew, I said, includes waiters and stewards. It includes all deck stewards, and all men who are employed by the deck stewards, as well as the scrubbers and painters and everything of that kind.

Mr. SPOONER. The able-bodied seamen "wash down" the deck and all that.

Mr. FRYE. The able seamen are needed to handle the boats.

Mr. SPOONER. You do not need the able seamen to scrub the deck, but you need the able seamen in time of peril and in time of storm. They scrub the deck in time of sunshine and smooth sea.

Mr. FRYE. Under the United States statute, wherever the word "seaman" or "crew" is used it includes everybody on board of a ship having anything to do with the working of the ship. So there ought to be a pretty strict definition if you undertake to make a provision of law.

Mr. SPOONER. That is what I think, and it is not in the bill.

Mr. FRYE. Then, there is another thing which I think the Senator overlooked in the remark I heard about the certificate required. There is entered on the log of a ship everything about the conduct of a sailor, his qualifications as a sailor, his manner of service, and when he is sick where he goes to the hospital. Everything of that kind is on the log of the ship, and that log is deposited with the shipping commission; so that all those difficulties which the Senator raises about the granting of a certificate are without foundation in fact.

Mr. SPOONER. I doubt that. But is there any harm to have some provision in the bill which would render it difficult to reduce the sailor's ordinary pay by the amount in whole or in part——

Mr. FRYE. You can not reduce the sailor's pay. Good gracious! You can not get sailors on the Pacific coast. To-day sailors earn from $100 to $125 a month—more than captains—on the ordinary tramp ships.

Mr. GALLINGER. Foreign tramps?

Mr. FRYE. Foreign tramps. The sailors' union is running the Pacific coast business, and that is shown by the wages which they compel them to pay.

Mr. SPOONER. Of the bounty or retainer?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish to put in the RECORD a statement in reference to the Naval Reserve. A careful calculation shows that we have in this country, including the Great Lakes, about 96,500 seamen. Of course they are not all Americans; probably not more than fifty or fifty-five thousand of them are. Great Britain has 250,000 seamen, and Great Britain has been working a great many years under a retainer somewhat smaller than this bill provides to get a naval reserve. She has succeeded in getting 33,500 men out of 275,000.

Mr. FRYE. Is there any objection to putting in the Senator's bill a limitation of 10,000 as the number of the Naval Reserve?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly not. The Merchant Marine Commission and the Committee on Commerce of this body, who considered this bill, hoped that in the course of ten years, under the provisions of the bill, we might get 10,000 naval reserves, but I have very little hope that we shall succeed in doing it. As the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] suggests, there is no objection on the part of anybody, so far as I know, to limiting the Naval Reserve to 10,000.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Just one further remark.

The Senator from Wisconsin suggests that he is going to put in the RECORD a statement from certain seamen in opposition to this bill—resolutions, I believe. I presume I have a copy of them here. They come from the Pacific coast. They are signed by Mr. Elison. I wonder that it was not Mr. Furuseth who signed them. We took testimony on the Pacific coast in regard to this matter, and we heard Mr. Furuseth and Mr. Livernash and those men at great length. I want to state just one question and one answer, if I can turn to it. Representative MINOR asked what proportion of the men on the Pacific coast were Americans, and Mr. Jortall replied: "I think 5 per cent." I have a table showing that on the Pacific coast there are only about 5 per cent who are American seamen. These resolutions come from foreigners who are on our ships receiving our wages, which are larger than they can get on foreign ships; also participating in a better food schedule and better quarters, and yet they refuse to become citizens of the United States, and they protest against this legislation on the ground that it is going to be oppressive to them.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have very little information upon the subject either of the Navy or of the merchant marine. It has never been my good fortune to serve either in the other House or in the Senate on committees having jurisdiction of those subjects. But I have been very much interested in the exposition of this matter given by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and I have certain suggestions to make, and shall be glad to have the opinion of the Senator from New Hampshire as to their value.

I assume that aid is necessary, first, because American ships cost for construction about 25 per cent more than foreign ships, and, second, because the administration of American ships costs about from 30 to 50 per cent more.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, he had better reverse those figures as to the difference between administration and construction.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And say that the difference in the cost of construction is 50 per cent and the difference in the cost of administration is 25 per cent?

Mr. GALLINGER. Thirty-five and 25 per cent would be nearer the correct figures.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I assume that so long as those conditions stand there will be no ships built in America for the foreign trade, or very few, because, even assuming we should be willing to pay more for the construction, the constant factor of the greater expense of administration would always stand against the American ship in the trade of the world.

I understand that our object is to enlarge our merchant marine, first, for the purpose of enlarging our foreign trade, and, second, for the purpose of supplementing our Navy with a service from which we can draw both men and ships in case of emergency. The difficulty we have now, as I understand it, with our Navy is that we find it difficult to get men to man our ships, and the merchant marine, which is a training school for the Navy, is undeveloped.

Assuming, therefore, that the Government must do something, I wish to avoid as far as possible subsidizing private interests; and the question arises in my mind as to whether we can not avoid subsidy by making a portion, at least, of the merchant marine a part of the Navy itself, so that the vessels so constructed will be ready in case of emergency for the use of the Navy and during time of peace can be used in the merchant marine.

What do we need in the way of supplementary shipping in order to maintain the efficiency of our Navy? We have the report of the General Staff of the Army, in which, being asked by this Commission their opinion as to what number of ships and what tonnage of ship will be required for the purpose of supplementing our Navy in the protection of our insular possessions should they be threatened by a great military power, they say they would require 228 vessels of an average tonnage of from 6,000 to 6,500 tons each, and they adopt 14 knots per hour as the standard for that tonnage. They say that the total tonnage required would be about 1,368,000 tons.

The Senator will recollect that in the discussion of the affairs of the Oceanic Steamship Company it was developed that each steamer owned by that company cost about $1,000,000. Those steamers go at the rate of 14 knots an hour; they cost from $900,000 to $1,000,000, and they are of about 6,500 tons each. So that it appears that if the necessary vessels are to be constructed and placed in the service of our merchant marine simply for the purpose of supplementing the Navy in its work, the expenditure of about $228,000,000 will be necessary. If those ships are necessary, if in war they are an essential part of our Navy, and if, under existing conditions, it is utterly impossible for us to secure those ships because of the deficiency in our American merchant marine, I ask whether it is not a part of the construction of our Navy to supply these supplementary ships and to have them on hand in case of emergency? Would it not be well to diminish to the same degree the expenditure of our Navy, now aggregating over $100,000,000 annually, and just to the extent that you take off from that appropriation to apply the difference to the construction of these steamers of 6,500 tons capacity, each one of them costing a million dollars? We could go on constructing these ships, say, at the rate of five or ten a year, involving a cost for construction of not more than $10,000,000. Then how would those ships be utilized? By having them at hand in case of war we could use them just as we used the St. Louis, just as we used the City of Peking and other ships that were chartered from private corporations during the late Spanish war; and during time of peace could we not let out those ships to private corporations at a rental involving a return of a certain percentage of their cost?

It seems to me that, under existing conditions, we could hardly expect private corporations to build these ships. Even if you grant a subsidy the shipbuilders will be fearful that it may at some time be withdrawn. It is exceedingly probable that should there be a change of Administration the subsidy would be withdrawn, and this fear would endanger the success of the proposed legislation. It would also compel them to demand a larger amount in the way of subvention or subsidy because of the risk as to the time during which they would receive it.

Now, how would these ships be manned? This very project, as I understand it, involves the creation of a naval reserve—a naval reserve which would ultimately reach 10,000 men. It is proposed that the officers and seamen in that naval reserve shall receive an annual sum from the Government as a perpetual retainer. They are enlisted for a fixed period of time, subject to call at any time for active duty should there be war, and meanwhile they are paid a certain sum for the privilege that the Government has of calling upon them at any time for active service.

What is this sum? Under the pending bill the sum averages about $50 per annum apiece for officers and men—not more than from twenty-five to thirty dollars per annum, I believe, for the men and a larger sum for the officers. I do not believe that that will be sufficient to make up the difference between the foreign wage and the domestic wage, and unless the Government pays the excess which the American seaman demands over the foreign seamen we can not expect American shipowners to go into competition with foreign shipowners in foreign transportation. We must give the men the domestic wage. If that wage is 35 per cent above the foreign wage we must see to it that they get it, and they must get it either from the shipowners or from the Government—one or the other.

American shipowners can not pay it, because they can not engage in foreign transportation in competition with the entire world and pay 35 per cent more for their administration than their competitors. It would simply mean that they would run the business at a loss, or they would go out of business, or, rather, they would never enter it at all. So it seems to me we must face the necessity of allowing each man of the naval reserve a larger amount than is allowed him in this bill.

Ten thousand men with an annual retainer of $50 per annum would cost the Government $500,000 a year. An annual average wage of $100 would cost the Government $1,000,000 annually. It seems to me we would have to pay them at least $100 per annum, and perhaps more, so that for 10,000 men the United States would pay from $1,000,000 to $1,500,000 per annum simply for the right to call upon them for their services in case of war or emergency. The more the Government pays the less the shipowner will pay, and if by this annual governmental pay we can cover the difference between the domestic pay and the foreign pay the American shipowner will be able to run and administer his ships.

Assuming now that the Government should within the next ten years, we will say, or within the next few years, construct twenty ships, we will say, of 6,500 tons capacity, how could they be employed in time of peace so as to return the Government an interest upon the investment? I ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether it would not be possible to organize private corporations resembling the Oceanic and Australian Steamship Company, to which reference was made the other day? That company was organized in San Francisco and is engaged in trade between San Francisco and Australia. It has four ships of 6,500 tons capacity, and I believe they are ample for the present trade between San Francisco and Australia. Would it not be possible to organize similar lines, or two or three similar lines, for service down the coast toward South America, or is that covered now by private enterprise?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will examine the bill, I think he will see that we provide for just that contingency by establishing certain lines, some of which run from the Pacific coast, though possibly they do not cover the exact routes the Senator suggests. We carefully inquired into it, however, and thought that we put the routes where they would increase American commerce and American trade. That is what we are after.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator inform me how many such routes are covered by this bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. There are seven steamship routes provided for where we have not at the present time a single American ship, and then there are three additional routes—ten routes in all.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Is there any estimate as to the number of ships that will be necessary upon those routes?

Mr. GALLINGER. That can be ascertained very accurately. It is not stated in the report, and I can not tell the Senator offhand the exact number.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I presume four or five for each line would be required.

Mr. GALLINGER. Quite likely, though some lines would get along with two or three.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But it would average, I imagine, four or five. That number would be ample, would it not?

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. For seven lines that would make twenty-eight or thirty ships, costing a million dollars apiece. Now, we will assume the Government constructs those ships as a part of the Navy and then lets them out to private corporations, at a rental that will replace the ships, let us say, in twenty years, and meanwhile give an interest of 3 per cent upon the investment. Those ships would then be the transports, the scouts, and the supplemental ships that are necessary in time of emergency and time of war—just such ships as we employed during the Spanish war—and they would be manned by men belonging to this naval reserve numbering 10,000 men, and those men would be paid partly by the ship company and partly by the Government, the Government contributing from 25 to 30 per cent of their entire pay simply for the right to call upon those men for their services in case of war.

In addition to that a certain amount of military discipline, it seems to me, could be maintained. We could put upon some of these ships at least one naval officer, who could give the men the preliminary training that would be required for service on a man-of-war, and thus we could gradually supplement the fighting ships with the scouts, the transports, and the colliers—all of them absolutely essential to the complete working of the Navy, all of them absolutely necessary in case of war, and yet all of them serving a useful purpose in time of peace.

The construction of these ships would keep our shipyards busy. I think that Congress would probably not assent to the construction of these ships abroad in order to secure them at a less cost, for one of the purposes of all this legislation relating both to the Navy and the merchant marine is to maintain American shipyards, and of course we can not maintain shipyards unless we build ships on American soil.

So we have as essential to this entire system the naval and mercantile shipyards, the fighting vessels, and the carrying vessels, and I see no reason why we should not enter in an experimental way upon such a plan. It would entirely do away with subsidy to private interests. We could keep control over the corporations which lease these ships from the United States. We could control their incorporation under national laws, and, it seems to me, as the control over commerce between the States and with foreign nations is intrusted to the National Government we should see to it that these corporations are organized under national law, so that we can keep proper control and receive proper information regarding their receipts and expenditures.

The vice of this entire system of subsidy is that we allow a corporation to be organized under State law, and then we subsidize that corporation without having any control over it, without having any knowledge or inspection of its books and accounts, and without having any knowledge as to whether it needs a subsidy or not, except such as is given in casual hearings and inquiries. It does seem to me that by incorporating these shipping companies engaged in foreign trade under a national law and maintaining control over them, and requiring publicity as to their accounts, we could see to it that no advantage over the Government was secured; and we could, by this gradual method, involving an expenditure of very much less than is contemplated by this bill, enlarge our mercantile marine, enlarge our Navy, and enlarge the force upon which the Navy must call in case of war.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire—and I make the inquiry in all candor, because I do not profess to have much information upon this subject—whether this plan would be practicable?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will reply by asking the Senator what he thinks would become of a bill if he should introduce it and send it to the Committee on Naval Affairs, involving the principle for which he has been arguing? In other words, as I understand, the Senator is in favor of the Government of the United States building thirty or forty merchant marine ships, costing a million dollars or so apiece, and letting them out to private parties to operate upon a rental. If the Government goes into that business, why not into building factories and every other conceivable industry that the Senator could think of? Why confine it to ships?

Mr. NEWLANDS. My answer is that these ships are an essential part of the Navy, absolutely necessary, according to the statement of the Navy itself and of the General Staff of the Army, to supplement the Navy itself when the use of the Navy is required.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now we keep a navy in existence, though we have no war, simply because its use will be necessary in an emergency. It is just as essential that we should have these supplementary ships, these transports, these colliers, and these scouts. These thirty ships would cover that class.

Mr. GALLINGER. My answer to the Senator is that his theory is beautiful, sounds well, and looks attractive; but it is as impracticable, in my judgment, as any other theory the Senator could possibly evolve. I do not believe this country is ever going into the building of ships and then letting them out to private parties upon a basis of 3 per cent income, as the Senator suggests.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I quite agree with the Senator in that, and if the Navy did not require these ships I should regard the thing as entirely impracticable; but they state that we do require these ships. We require them just as much as men-of-war. When men-of-war are needed, the use of these colliers and these transports and these scouts is needed; and we all know to-day that if a great naval war were to occur we could not get enough ships from our present merchant marine to supplement the Navy. We know that.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is absolutely correct in making that statement. That is the fact, and it is a deplorable fact.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is a deplorable fact. It is an absolute naval necessity that we have these ships, and I base my proposition upon that.

Let us see about the cost of it. Thirty ships, enough to serve all these lines to which the Senator referred, would cost $30,000,000. Three thousand men would be required on these ships. They should be enlisted in the Naval Reserve.

The pay of $100 per annum to 3,000 men would cost $300,000 per annum, or in the course of ten years it would cost $3,000,000. Add that to the $30,000,000 for the ships, and you have a total cost of $33,000,000. The bill which is suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire provides for an expenditure of $40,000,000 in ten years, and at the end of that time the Government has nothing to show for it; whilst under the plan I suggest the Government would have thirty ships, worth approximately $30,000,000. The rental received from the ships could be applied to building ships for new lines of trade. So it seems to me this plan has the advantage of that plan upon the score of economy.

Then, there is another thing I wish to criticise, and that is this: Wherever the Government makes a subsidy it should compel the corporation which receives the subsidy to incorporate under national law. The State is utterly incompetent to deal with the question of foreign trade, and the national law should provide, just as the interstate-commerce law does, for publicity as to receipts and expenditures. As it is, it is utterly impossible for us to tell, except from the statements of interested parties, as to whether or not these subventions are required. If a national corporation is subsidized, and you have on record sworn statements regarding its receipts and expenditures, and you find that in performing a certain service it meets with a certain loss, you know accurately just what loss has got to be filled by Government aid. As it is, there seems to be no accuracy of adjustment in these matters.

It seems to me the plan which I have proposed entirely does away with the suggestion of subsidy, which is repellant to the mind of almost everybody. The Government undertakes the construction only of those ships that are absolutely necessary to its service. It enters upon the employment of men who are absolutely necessary for its service, but simply as a matter of economical administration, lets out those ships and lets out those men to private corporations in time of peace, so that the Government may not be put to this large expenditure of administering ships for which there is no present use. That does not involve the ordinary significance of paternalism or of Government ownership, the construction of public utilities, and so on. It is simply building up a proportionate navy.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire whether it would not create rather a formidable competition to any private shipbuilding industry if the Government should build twenty great ships and rent them to private corporations for carrying purposes? Would it not probably discourage, if not destroy, shipbuilding by individuals, who would have to enter into a field of competition with these Government ships, rented on a basis of 3 per cent profit on the cost of the ship? Does it seem to the Senator that any private individual would or could build ships to compete in the carrying trade with those Government-built and Government-equipped ships, rented on a basis of 3 per cent on the cost of building?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator entirely misunderstood me if he thought that I proposed that the Government should build these ships. What I proposed was that the Government should let out contracts for the ships, and they would be constructed in private shipyards, just as all the other ships of the country are now.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understood the Senator to say distinctly, in reply to the question asked him by the Senator from New Hampshire, that the Government would build these ships and lease them on a basis of 3 per cent profit upon the original cost.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I may have stated that, but I used the word "build" in the sense that the Government would pay for the building of the ships, not that it would actually construct them itself. The Senator will recall that I insisted upon shipyards as a part of the naval establishment. Shipyards are absolutely essential, and the private shipyard is absolutely essential. I do not propose to usurp their functions.

Mr. GALLINGER. After the Senator gets these ships built, how is he going to get them operated when it costs 25 per cent more to operate American ships than foreign ships?

Mr. NEWLANDS. As to that, let me say to the Senator right here that I propose that these ships shall be manned by the men employed in the Naval Reserve, and I propose that the Government shall pay a much larger sum to those men than is provided for in this bill. The bill provides for an average, for officers and men, of $50 a man per annum, which, in my judgment, is not enough to equalize conditions. I should say from a hundred to a hundred and fifty dollars per annum, and thus relieve the shipowner of 25 or 30 per cent additional expense he is now under in administering his ship, as compared with a foreign ship.

Mr. GALLINGER. You would give a subsidy in a little different form than is proposed in this bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. You may call it a subsidy, but it is the pay of men in the United States service and who are subject to be called at any time for military duty. It is simply an army on furlough engaged in the pursuits of peace in times of peace, subject at any time to the call of war.

Mr. ALLISON obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to submit an amendment to be read, printed, and lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, in line 7, after the word "ninety-eight," add:

Nor shall these subventions be paid to any vessel of less than 200 tons gross register engaged in the foreign trade, or to any vessel of less than 20 tons gross register engaged in the deep-sea fisheries.

Mr. FRYE. That is safe.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from New Hampshire has relieved me very much by the limit of 20 tons in the deep-sea fisheries.

Mr. President, I do not expect to occupy any great length of time in the discussion of this bill. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] in one respect, and that is that it is the best bill I have seen presented to the Senate for some time at least, as respects its provisions. I do not know whether I now understand the general purpose of the bill. If I understand it, the first proposition is found in the naval-reserve plan, which proposes to give a subvention to all the sailors who now sail in American ships on the ocean, to all the people who are engaged in the Newfoundland or deep-sea fisheries, and to all the other people who are engaged in any fisheries, whether on the Atlantic or Pacific or on the Great Lakes. In other words, this subvention is open to all the people who are now engaged in navigation on the ocean or on the Lakes.

As I understand the bill, there is nothing in it which compels any man, who allows his name to be enrolled, to come under the provisions of the laws which appertain to the Navy. There is nothing in the first section of the bill at the present time—and here I differ in construction with the Senator from Wisconsin—that constitutes a binding obligation upon any person who becomes a member of the naval reserve, other than a civil contract. In order to make the naval reserve what its friends propose for it and what it ought to be if it is to be a reserve, there should be an enlistment in the Navy, subjecting those who enter the service to all the articles of the Navy service, both in time of war and in time of peace. Again, if we do not engage in war within four years, these men are not required, even by civil contract, to enter the service of the Government.

I did not understand the Senator from New Hampshire to claim in the discussion he had with the Senator from Wisconsin, that the people who enter the naval service are required to subject themselves to the laws which appertain to the Navy. Do I understand the Senator so to construe the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think I ought to take a little time to think that out before giving a definite answer.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. GALLINGER. My own impression is that the word "enrollment" substantially covers the Senator's contention, and that it is practically an enlistment. If that be so, it answers the objection that the Senator makes.

I am fortified in that view by the fact that the Navy Department itself framed the provision, and it seems to me the wise men there would not have made a provision which would be inoperative or fail to accomplish the purpose they have so much at heart. The Navy Department is very anxious, and has been for years, to secure a naval reserve.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to have that made clear in the pending bill, if it is not clear now. I propose to strike out the word "enroll" and insert "enlist, subject to the laws and regulations governing the Navy." Otherwise I do not think this will be of any great value.

So far as concerns the officers who are to receive a hundred and ten dollars a year, I have no doubt in case of war, particularly a war with a foreign country, if they could not get into the service otherwise, they would give several hundred dollars to become an officer.

I am sorry to see in the bill this general provision respecting the naval reserve. I think it ought to constitute a separate measure providing for a naval reserve; but I am conciliated by the observation a Senator made to me on the subject, that if we undertake to put it on a naval bill or make it a separate bill covering the naval reserve, we will find it will cost us a great many millions in the end. So I am somewhat reconciled to it, because I think it will not cost us very many millions annually, provided we adopt an amendment, suggested by the Senator from Maine, I believe, that it be limited to 10,000 men.

I should think it ought to be limited for the present to three or four thousand. Probably in the first four years we would not enroll under this bill 10,000 men unless we put them into the naval service, and if we did, very few sailors and officers would enlist, in my judgment.

There are two or three amendments I wish to propose to this provision. They relate to the payment of money. We have had a great deal of discussion—not public discussion, but a great deal of discussion among Senators—as to the gradual growth of these indefinite appropriations that run along without anybody knowing what they amount to unless you take the trouble to dig into the archives of the various Departments. So I hope the Senator from New Hampshire in charge of the bill will allow me to make some amendments that will provide for annual appropriations, so far as this bill is concerned, and especially this clause. I wish to offer two or three amendments.

On page 4, line 11, I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 11, strike out the words "in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated" and insert in lieu thereof the words "to be annually appropriated therefor, upon estimates to be annually submitted to Congress in the Book of Estimates;" so as to read:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, upon proper audit, to pay out of any money to be annually appropriated therefor upon estimates to be annually submitted to Congress in the Book of Estimates to each officer, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie over.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it might very well be adopted now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that action upon amendments now would be in contravention of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is true. Let it be printed and lie over.

Mr. HALE. Let the amendment be stated again.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie over.

Mr. ALLISON. I also wish to offer an amendment, on page 4, in line 10, after the word "audit," to insert "by the Auditor of the Navy Department."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 10, after the words "proper audit," it is proposed to insert "by the Auditor of the Navy Department."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and go over.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 5, line 7, I move to strike out "Commissioner of Navigation" and insert——

Mr. GALLINGER. It is proposed to insert the "Secretary of Commerce and Labor."

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator has another amendment in mind. On page 5, lines 4 and 5, I move to strike out "by an officer to be designated;" so as to read:

Such retainer shall be paid at the end of each year of service on certificate by the Secretary of the Navy.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie over.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 7, page 5, I move to strike out the words "Commissioner of Navigation" and to insert "Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, the first clause refers to the manner in which a person has conducted himself as a member of the naval reserve, whether he has obeyed the regulations and been subject to discipline, and all that. But the second certificate goes only to the manner in which the man has discharged his duties on shipboard.

Mr. HALE. On a merchant vessel?

Mr. SPOONER. On a merchant vessel. The Secretary of the Navy would have no facilities, under existing law, which would enable him to make such certificate.

Mr. ALLISON. I only followed the error, if it be an error, of the committee, because they have inserted "by an officer to be designated by the Secretary of the Navy." If the Secretary can not ascertain it himself, he ought not to designate an officer to do it. Therefore I am not subject to criticism.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think the Senator's amendment is open to criticism, so far as it relates to the first certificate.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the next certificate.

Mr. SPOONER. But when it comes to the next certificate, he moves to strike out "Commissioner of Navigation" and insert "Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. ALLISON. No; I do not. I move to insert "Secretary of Commerce and Labor."

Mr. GALLINGER. The "Secretary of Commerce and Labor." That is right. But the Senator did say inadvertently "Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will lie over and be considered to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly. I want to have the amendment stated at the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator please restate his last proposed amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. The last amendment I proposed is in line 7, page 5, to strike out the words "Commissioner of Navigation" and insert "Secretary of Commerce and Labor."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 7, strike out the words "Commissioner of Navigation" and insert in lieu thereof "Secretary of Commerce and Labor."

Mr. ALLISON. That is right. On page 5, lines 23 and 24, I move the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 23, it is proposed to strike out the words "not otherwise appropriated" and insert in lieu thereof the words "to be annually appropriated therefor, upon estimates to be annually submitted to Congress in the Book of Estimates."

Mr. ALLISON. I will offer another amendment, in order to get it before the Senate, in lieu of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire. On page 5, line 24, before the word "hereafter," I move to insert "of over 500 gross registered tons."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 24, after the word "vessel," it is proposed to insert the words "of over 500 gross registered tons."

Mr. GALLINGER. I will take this opportunity to say that the amendments the Senator has offered are doubtless in the direction of improving the bill, especially in the method of paying out the money. On the last amendment which the Senator has offered, however, I shall want to be heard, as I think by that amendment he will exclude a large class of ships that ought to be encouraged. But we can talk about that to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. I proposed my amendment in order that we might have two plans before us to talk about, rather than one.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well.

Mr. ALLISON. While I have the floor I will say that I can not see what great advantage it will be to pay a subsidy to or provide for a steamship of less than 500 tons, either in the merchant marine service or in time of war. If there is any steamship of less than 500 tons which would be used in the merchant marine and would be valuable in time of war, I do not know what it is.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator propose to make any difference between a sailing ship and a steamship?

Mr. ALLISON. I might in the last analysis, if I can not do any better.

Mr. FRYE. There is a good deal of difference when you come to gross tons between a sailing ship and a steamship.

Mr. ALLISON. That is to say, the steamship has a larger average tonnage.

Mr. FRYE. The steamship has a very much——

Mr. ALLISON. Heavier gross tonnage.

Mr. FRYE. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. That is what I supposed.

I wish in suggesting these amendments to show some defects in the bill that I think ought to be corrected, and I am making them in good faith. Whether I shall be able to vote for the measure later or not, I certainly have not done very much harm to it thus far.

Mr. President, there is another amendment I had prepared, but I do not find it on my desk. However, I will call attention to it here. There is no provision in the bill for any repealing clause. I do not know that it is necessary, but there are so many complicated provisions in it that I think there should be a repealing clause. Of course, that repealing clause would not interfere with any contracts already made under the provisions of the law; but I think we should put everybody upon notice that if we find any trouble about the bill we will have the right to amend it, except as it applies to specific contracts already made.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I presume I am correct in the assumption that even without that provision Congress would have that power.

Mr. ALLISON. I think so, although there are so many direct and indirect provisions here I was a little afraid the statute of limitations might be applied as respects some of them.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me, the object of inserting that amendment is not because of the question of power, but it is to put everyone upon notice that Congress reserves the right to exercise the power without being subject fairly to the charge of bad faith.

Mr. GALLINGER. I certainly know of no objection to that proposed amendment. It is the usual form.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it ought to be put in.

Mr. GALLINGER. If put in, contracts already made ought to be protected.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I hope if the Senator offers the amendment as to gross tonnage, limiting it to 500 tons, he will make a distinction between steamships and sailing ships, and not have it apply to sailing ships.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not believe that this subsidy or subvention ought to be granted to a steamship of less than a thousand tons burden; but I made it 500 tons in order to include both steamships and sailing ships. If we expect by this means to enlarge either our foreign or domestic trade, it seems to me that we must encourage the building of ships of at least a thousand gross tons, whether they be sail or steam, but certainly steamships.

Mr. SPOONER. Are there any 500-ton steamships?

Mr. ALLISON. There are probably very few such ships, but I do not want to encourage the building of them.

Mr. President, more for the purpose of having the Senator from New Hampshire express his views upon the various provisions of the bill, I want to reserve a criticism as respects the second provision of the bill.

Mr. HALE. On what page?

Mr. ALLISON. On page 4 or 5.

Mr. GALLINGER. The second section.

Mr. ALLISON. There are three things in the bill. One is to help the fisheries and the people who are sailing about on our coasts from one little place to another with very small sailing vessels. Sub silentio the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] says we have nothing to do with the coasting people. I understand the first section of the bill deals with all the people who sail on our coasts whether by steam or by sailing vessels. They are all gathered into this naval reserve, as I understand it, and they are all to take the chances of war for four years, if they are officers, receiving $440 at the end of the four years if there is no war. If there should happen to be a war within those four years, I think very likely, unless we would largely increase the pay, they would prefer to remain on the merchant ship rather than to enlist in the Navy even as officers; and if we continue to enlarge the number of officers in our Navy as we are doing now we will find very little opportunity for the commander of a merchant ship to become the commander of any ship in the service during war, unless it be a transport or something of that sort. So it does apply in this indirect way to the reserve feature.

The second provision of the bill is the provision authorizing anyone to build an American ship and sail it. I do not think there is any limit as to tonnage as respects these ships, either.

Mr. GALLINGER. None, except the Senator's proposed amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. That would apply to both.

Mr. President, we had a very excellent bill in many ways some years ago before the Senate, and it passed the Senate, but it provided for a subsidy on an entirely different basis from the bill now before the Senate. That bill as it passed the Senate provided for ships of low speed to engage in our foreign trade and receive a certain sum for each hundred miles traveled; and it was supposed that the ships would make so many voyages to foreign ports and return in a year. There was some provision in it, I think, that required them to make a certain number of voyages if they had a certain rate of speed, and with a greater speed a larger number of voyages, and so forth.

I am making these criticisms to be corrected if I am mistaken. As I understand the pending bill, if I build a ship under it I can sail from the port of Norfolk to London or any other foreign port, from there to another foreign port, and from there to still another foreign port, and if I sail on the 14th day of February and can get back to Norfolk by the 13th of February of the next year and can get a proper certificate for this bounty or subvention of $5 a ton, or whatever it is, I can secure it from the Treasury.

In other words, I could make one voyage to Europe and another voyage back again, sailing to the Philippines in the meantime, or to China, and get this subsidy. If that is not the purpose of the bill, then if I am mistaken I shall be glad to have the Senator from New Hampshire correct me.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that very likely technically that is so; but it is not expected that under the provisions of section 2 of the bill any ships will be put on the North Atlantic trade. There is no expectation that ships will sail to London or Liverpool. The purpose is to encourage cargo ships. There was very severe criticism against the Frye-Hanna bill that it did not take care of the cargo ships, where they will sail to a point nearer home, with which countries we are needing trade, and where we can materially increase our trade. But I think there was no idea that under that provision there would be any great trade established between this country and England or Germany.

Mr. ALLISON. The criticism I make is that no trade will be established under it between this country and any country; that a tramp ship can go the world around under this bill and get as many cargoes as it can and whenever it can, and return here within ten days of the lapse of a year and get the subsidy.

Now, that does not encourage foreign trade with the United States, as it seems to me. If a ship goes out on the sea as a tramp ship to compete with all the other tramp ships on the ocean it will do as they do. It will go to the port which will enable it to secure the largest cargo at the best price. Therefore, it is no encouragement, it seems to me, to American shipping in the way of securing foreign trade between foreign ports and the United States. That is one objection which appears to me to be a serious one to this bill.

The third provision of the bill is a provision intended to establish new lines of steamers between certain Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific ports in our country and South American and Asiatic ports. I am in favor of all the provisions in the bill so far as I have seen them, although I was somewhat shaken by the suggestions of the correspondent of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] when he said there would be no subsidy granted either from Mobile or Galveston. I think if we establish these lines as we propose to establish them with countries with which we have now very little trade we ought at least to give them the opportunity of establishing trade with these countries before we put in competition with them a lot of tramp ships. We are giving here a subsidy to people who roam around the world, and then we also subsidize specific lines.

I am in favor of that provision of the bill not on the general ground so often stated, that the cost of building a ship here is 25 per cent greater and the cost of running a ship 33 per cent greater, but on the ground that there is a large trade in the countries named in these last clauses which we ought to have, and which we are fairly entitled to have, but which we can not induce our shipping men to establish lines for without giving them a subvention of some kind. As I understand the general provision here, beginning with section 2, page 3, I object to it because I think it will have the effect of greatly interfering with the provisions we have made for special lines.

There is another thing that has struck me in examining the bill, which has given me some trouble. We subsidize all the steamships and all the sailing vessels between the ports of the United States and the ports of the Caribbean Sea and between the ports of the United States and the ports of the Dominion of Canada in the northeastern portion of our country as well as in the northwestern. When we had this question up before us two or three years ago, I remember very well we made an exemption, not upon an enlarged debate, but by general consent, by which these provisions should not apply to the Canadian provinces or to Cuba.

The trade of the United States with Cuba last year was $130,000,000, in round numbers, in the aggregate—exports and imports. Our trade with the islands of the Caribbean Sea is very great. All this trade is now constantly increasing. Nearly half of our trade, as I gather, of the $130,000,000 is now in American ships between here and Cuba. It may be that that is too large an estimate.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, while I have not the figures at hand at this moment, the Senator's estimate, I am sure, is very much too high.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. I would like to have American ships do all the trade if we could do it; but not if we must do it at the expense of paying this double bounty, because that is what we are doing, Mr. President. For the ships that ply between near-by ports we are to pay the sailors and we are to pay the subvention to these tramp ships, and we are also to pay a subsidy to the mail ships under the last clause of the bill.

Mr. President, I commend very much the Senator from New Hampshire and the gentlemen who have prepared the pending bill and prepared it with great pains and made great sacrifices in the investigation of the questions leading up to it. I commend them for all that. They have given us very much valuable information. But I do think that if we are to increase our trade with foreign countries we must begin with those countries that we do not now have access to with American ships, and that in a trade such as our trade with Cuba and the local trade between the northeastern portion of our country and the Canadian provinces they are not pressed—I will use that word—as the other parts of the country are pressed, in order to reach foreign ports.

I have not seen the statements of the Commission. They may have taken testimony to show that, notwithstanding our trade with Canada is very great, it is not conducted in American ships. I do not know how that is, but surely there must be ships under our flag, either by sail or steam, or both, that ply between our ports and the Canadian provinces.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think, Mr. President, it would be safe to say that the small proportion of our trade with the Dominion of Canada by water is largely done with sailing vessels, and it is a very small proportion of the entire carrying trade to Canada.

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose the greater portion of our carrying trade with Canada is by rail.

Mr. GALLINGER. By rail; certainly.

Mr. HALE. I suppose the Senator from Iowa appreciates what I can say is the underlying proposition of this bill, not to increase trade and commerce. There is plenty of that.

Mr. ALLISON. Our trade?

Mr. HALE. Our trade. It will naturally increase. But the object is to increase the carrying trade in American ships.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; I understand that. If I did not say so, I ought to have said it.

Mr. HALE. The Senator gave an illustration of the trade with the people of the Spanish Main. It is large; it is increasing; and that is a matter of gratification; but what the bill seeks to do is to so frame legislation that the carrying of that great trade, which is already going on, shall be not in foreign ships, but in American ships. That is the substance of the pending bill. There are $200,000,000 that to-day go to foreign shippers, to foreign vessels, for the freighting of this immense commerce of the United States, and without interfering with that, and in the end incidentally increasing it, the purpose of the bill is to so legislate as to divert some portion of that freight money—I would be glad to see a very large portion of it—into the hands of our own citizens. I believe it to be entirely practicable that under a suitable bill one-half of that immense amount of money instead of being paid to and received by and enjoyed by foreign ships can be received by our own ships, and thus add to the material prosperity of the country.

The trade, the commerce, is largely already established, but it is the freighting, it is the carrying, it is the money that is paid for it that goes into the hands of our rivals that we are trying to divert, so that we will get a portion of it.

Mr. ALLISON. I thoroughly agree with all the Senator has said as to what our effort is, not only to enlarge our trade, but to enlarge our trade in our own ships. When my friend interrupted me, I proposed to call attention to the fact that in the bill we passed three years ago we did not think it worth while to deal with the trade either with the provinces of Canada or with Cuba. I assume the situation was regarded as so important in other directions that it was thought best to develop this trade through our reciprocity provisions and the friendly relations we have with both Canada and Cuba.

Mr. President, it may be that the ships which are provided for in the second title of the bill will come into competition with the Canadian situation and with the ships of other countries in Cuba, but I very much fear that it will go very little in that direction, or, at least, very little farther than it would go without the subvention proposed in the the first two clauses.

I know that our trade is very large with Cuba now. I know that under provisions already in force there is being established a considerable trade with Cuba, and we are maintaining it at this time. But what I hope to see now is a bill which will not only enlarge our trade, but will enlarge it in our own ships. I believe in that, if possible. I wish also to enlarge our trade in directions where we are fairly entitled to it because of our imports and exports, and we know that we are not likely to secure any great portion of that trade until we give subventions to special lines of steamships on the Atlantic and on the Pacific coasts; and I am for both.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, in reference to Cuba, I will state that our imports last year amounted to $86,000,000 and our exports to $38,000,000 in round numbers. We imported more than twice as much as we exported to Cuba. I have ascertained since the Senator raised that question that we have been carrying in American ships about 35 per cent of that trade. It is decreasing very rapidly just now from some cause or other, just what I do not know. The maximum which we have carried was 35 per cent.

Mr. ALLISON. Our entire trade with Cuba amounted to about $130,000,000 last year, and if with that amount of exports and imports we could only secure 35 per cent of the trade between our country and Cuba in American ships, especially when some of those ships are subsidized in a small degree and when the transportation is so easy, what a commentary that is on our situation.

Take a large sailing ship or a small steamship and you can put alongside of it tows, as they are called, boats with sails, as I have seen them on the New England coast, carrying a great many thousand tons, a single fleet of ships, and under this bill, as I understand, every one of those ships or canal boats would have a subsidy in the form of tonnage. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if I am not correct that if I take a tow from Norfolk, which has one large sailing ship or a schooner or a steamer, and there run along, trailing after it, five other great ships, each with sails, the tonnage will not be reckoned on the basis of the contents of the gross tonnage of those ships?

Mr. GALLINGER. My answer would be that I should think not. I do not think that a scow would be called a ship.

Mr. ALLISON. I only gather that idea from the fact that in the bill passed three years ago it was found necessary to exclude them, and I supposed that they were excluded in that bill because its framers were afraid that otherwise they would be included.

Mr. GALLINGER. If they ever undertake to take a tow of that kind across to Habana, I hope they will have a pleasanter voyage than I had.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope so, too. It is not probable that they would take a tow of that kind to Habana, but I think it is quite possible they might take it across the water to New Brunswick or some other port.

I make these suggestions in order to present to the Senate the difficulty that I see in giving my support to this bill and to show the importance of making some changes in phraseology respecting these matters.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I did not want to interrupt the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] while he was speaking, but I now wish to ask him a question. In the first place, I suppose the main purpose of this bill is to increase our exports and perhaps our imports, but certainly to increase our exports. I want to know what objection there is to a ship sailing out of Norfolk, carrying scows, or whatever you call them, if the ship can do it? If the purpose is to carry American goods in American ships, does it make any difference whether they are in scows or tows or whether they are carried in any other way, so that they are carried?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think there is any objection to that, and I should be glad to have them carried in that way; but in the case of a ship with tows going to a port, we will say, in Mexico or in Canada, I should hardly think it was wise for this country to pay $5 a ton for the contents or for the gross tonnage of that ship, including the scows. That is my opinion.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator who has the bill in charge whether there has been a reprint of the bill since January 30? I think there have been some changes since made in it.

Mr. GALLINGER. There has not been a reprint since that date.

Mr. TELLER. Then I have the last print of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but there are certain amendments which have been made, which the Senator will find in italics, which have been adopted by the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. They are all in this bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. They are all in that bill.

Mr. TELLER. Have there been any amendments adopted since the bill was printed?

Mr. GALLINGER. I had one amendment adopted this morning. I will say to the Senator, not remembering, as the Chair afterwards ruled, that the amendment ought to lie over.

Mr. TELLER. I find on page 7, commencing in line 8, that sections 1 and 2 of an act approved April 15, 1904, entitled "An act to regulate shipping in trade between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago," etc., seem to be suspended by this bill for a time. Will the Senator explain why that is done?

Mr. GALLINGER. We passed a law in April, 1904, confining shipping to the Philippines to American bottoms after July of the present year, as I remember it.

Mr. TELLER. I remember the law very well.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has been found impracticable to put that law in operation for various reasons, as I understand. Both the President and the Secretary of War have recommended that it should be postponed until 1909.

Mr. TELLER. Well, Mr. President, as I did not vote for that bill and thought it was very objectionable, I should like to know what objection the Secretary of War and others have now found against it?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not consulted them personally about the matter. I simply know that they have thought it was not wise to engage in that trade under existing economic conditions in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. TELLER. Then why put it in this bill? Why not deal with that subject separately?

Mr. GALLINGER. It might have been dealt with separately, but it was thought this was a good place for it. We are dealing with transportation matters. We are dealing with shipping, and this related directly to that subject. So we put it in this bill. That is the only answer I can give the Senator on that point.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], with the permission of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], why it is necessary to give 30 per cent additional to vessels sailing between the Pacific ports and the Philippine Islands?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is simply on the same hypothesis that we give subventions to other vessels. We want the trade of the Philippine Islands, and we want to encourage American shipping to go to the Philippine Islands. In our former legislation we practically made the Philippine Islands trade coastwise, although we did not use that term. I doubt whether we properly could do so; but we did restrict the trade absolutely to American ships. Now, in suspending this provision of law, it was thought wise to give American ships some little encouragement by way of increased subvention.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand it, we give them 30 per cent in addition to what we give to other ships.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; we give them 30 per cent in addition.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. I only wanted to know the reason why it was done. I should hope, if the Senator from Colorado will allow me just one word more——

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I should hope that 30 per cent would satisfy those people having ships under our flag. I would be in favor of extending that period beyond 1909 and giving them 30 per cent in the meantime, because I think that three years from now it will be a very great hardship upon the Philippine people to be compelled to transport whatever they may produce between our country and the Philippines in American ships.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, recurring to the part of this bill relative to the naval reserve, I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire his construction, in order that we may test somewhat the practical operation of it. As I understand the first section—I am reading now from an amendment proposed by the committee—it is entirely a voluntary matter on the part of any of these officers, petty officers, or men, whether or not they will be enrolled as contemplated by this bill. If they are enrolled, the same section of the bill on page 4 provides that they shall—> receive such instruction and be subject to such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe.

Now, if I am correct in my construction of the bill as I have just read it, it may so happen that upon any given vessel there may be a part of the crew enrolled and a part of the crew not enrolled. I think that would be the natural consequence of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BACON. Of course under this provision there would be certain discipline prescribed for those officers and men who are thus enrolled, and certain regulations as to their conduct, drill, and other matters of detail, which would all in their exercise make up the efficiency of an officer or a man on shipboard. That would be limited to those men thus enrolled. Would it be practicable in the operation of a vessel that a part of the crew should be subject to one discipline—one series of regulations—whereas another part of the crew would be under altogether different regulations or under different discipline?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the only answer I can give to that is that, as I understand it, Great Britain has found it practicable. She has 33,500 of these men in her service, and I have been informed that they are enrolled and trained in precisely the same way that is proposed here. The Navy Department recommends this. I presume the Department has no question as to the feasibility of the scheme.

Mr. BACON. I would ask the Senator if he is informed whether or not in the British service it is true that on these vessels where they have this naval reserve a part of them are enrolled and a part of them are not enrolled?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so, for the reason that they have 200,000 seamen in the service and they have 33,500 naval-reserve men. I have no idea that those naval-reserve men man a ship exclusively.

Mr. BACON. It may be, though, that they have different requirements by which those who are enrolled are upon one ship and those who are not enrolled are upon another. I am asking for information. I do not know, and I should like to know whether the Senator is informed on that point. It seems to me that there would be much confusion necessarily arising.

Mr. GALLINGER. I can only give my opinion that the system is the same as is proposed in this bill.

Now, as to one other point raised more particularly by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. He insisted that this enrollment did not amount to anything; that we ought to have enlistment if we are going to do anything with these men. I telegraphed the general board of the Navy Department, under whose supervision this provision was prepared, asking them what "enrollment" meant. I do not know that this will meet the objection which the Senator from Wisconsin raised, but I want to read the reply by telegram just received:

"Enrollment" is a pledge for future service. "Enlistment" is a pledge for present and continuous service to a fixed date.

Signed by the general board.

I have thought that this enrollment was practically equivalent to enlistment; that men pledged themselves to perform this service under the conditions and requirements of the Navy Department; that there would be no doubt of their being subject to call, and that they would have to respond; but if that is not so, the bill can be strengthened in that respect if it is thought desirable.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, will the Senator——

Mr. BACON. Will my colleague pardon me just a moment?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. To recur to the matter about which I spoke a moment ago, since I asked the information from the Senator from New Hampshire I am informed by a gentleman, who says that he is not mistaken and can not be as to the fact, that the system of Great Britain does not consist in that which was suggested of a mixture upon the same ship of men who are enrolled and men who are not enrolled and in a discipline and regulation as to one which is not required of the other. I am informed that the system is this—that the men who are thus enrolled are disciplined upon the men-of-war, the naval vessels of Great Britain, for a limited period of time, during which they have to observe the regulations which are prescribed for that discipline, but that after that they go into the merchant-marine service as any other sailors, officers, or men, without any special discipline on that ship and without any special regulations upon that ship. Mr. President, while of course I was yielding to the suggestion of the Senator that it had been found in practice in the British service that such system was not objectionable and was not confusing, upon this statement of fact made to me I am still of the opinion that the provision made in this bill, under which there is evidently a contemplation that there shall be on the same ship part of a crew under one discipline and another part of the crew of the same rank without that discipline and without those regulations, is utterly impracticable.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, while very likely I was mistaken in the broad statement I made about the British naval reserve, I will ask the Senator where he finds anything in this provision that prohibits our Navy Department from doing precisely what he says is done in Great Britain?

Mr. BACON. Well, I do not know that it does prohibit it——

Mr. GALLINGER. They are to be enrolled——

Mr. BACON. But it strikes me, if that is the contemplation, there ought to be some such provision. Of course, these men can not be put upon the men-of-war without some authority of law. They are not in the employment of the United States so long as they are enrolled in this way until they are called for in case of necessity by the President. That is a provision of the bill. So that, if it is designed or if it is thought that that system should be adopted, it seems to me it ought to be more specifically prescribed and authority given for these men, when they enroll, to be for a limited time upon the men-of-war, and afterwards allowed to go under that enrollment in the service of the merchant marine.

Mr. GALLINGER. The naval reserve is similar to the militia of the States. It is a naval militia, and I take it that under this provision the Secretary of the Navy can have them drilled in such way as he may see fit. I suppose that certain vessels could be given up to that purpose. I see no inhibition in the bill in that direction, and I think, while very likely it would be confusing for a portion of the crew to be subjected to drill, yet they might have certain instruction, even if it is a mixed crew.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will see, however, that there is no provision in this bill for these men to be paid anything during the time of such instruction and drill except this bounty, because, of course, those who would employ them in the merchant marine hereafter would not pay them wages during the time when they were being thus drilled and disciplined by the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. All I can say in reply to the Senator is that I will look carefully into that. The debate will continue to-morrow, and if there is any weakness in the bill in that respect it ought to be cured. There is no question about that. But these men are to be under the Secretary of the Navy, subject to the requirements to be made by the Secretary. I apprehend that that was all taken into consideration by the Department when this provision was framed.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, if there is any justification whatever for this bill, it is that possibly we might increase the number of American ships that the Government might have the benefit of in case of emergency, in case of war. Nobody here, so far as I have heard the debate, has ever claimed that we would get any less rate on our goods exported or imported because they were carried in American bottoms. The shipper would get nothing less; the consumer would get nothing less. But I suppose it is hoped that we may get ships that can be called into the service if it becomes necessary.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] a few moments ago touched upon that question. This bill is fatally defective as to that, as will be found on page 8, unless it has been amended, and I can not find that it has been. It provides:

That said vessel may be taken and used by the United States, for the national defense or for any public purpose, at any time, upon payment to the owner or owners of the fair actual value of the same at the time of the taking, or a fair rate of hire to be agreed upon, etc.

Here is a provision that renders it utterly impossible for the Government to get possession of ships in the hour of extremity. I called the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to this ten days ago. It seems to me that it is a section that needs revision. There ought to be a provision that if the parties do not agree, the Government can take possession of the ships at once, the payment to be determined afterwards.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that I offered an amendment to-day covering that point.

Mr. TELLER. Very good. If that is so, I do not want to waste the time of the Senate discussing it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator was entirely right. The Senator raised that question the other day and satisfied me that he was entirely right, or some other Senator did—I do not know but that it was the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]—and I drafted an amendment which I think the Senator will see completely covers that objection.

Mr. TELLER. I would not say, Mr. President, that in time of great emergency the Government might not take a ship of a citizen, because we have done such things.

Mr. GALLINGER. The amendment covers that.

Mr. TELLER. But we can avoid that by simply amending it.

Now, I want to say just a word or two about the naval reserve provision. I think that principle is correct. It is a valuable feature of the bill. I do not believe, as I have said before, or as the Senator from Nevada expressed it to-day, that the pay is sufficient to induce this enrollment. I think it very desirable that we should train some American sailors, but I think, further, when you come to attempt to reorganize the American merchant marine and the naval reserve that there ought to be some method by which a man who has distinguished himself as captain of a merchant ship might be called into the service of the Government, and that he might have some opportunity to advance in the service. I do not see anything in this bill to enable the captain of a merchant ship or the mate of a merchant ship to have any preference or for the Government to have any claim upon him.

Mr. GALLINGER. He gets the rank of lieutenant in the naval reserve, I will say to the Senator, under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. The captain may get that. Yes, Mr. President, possibly he does. I do not know whether he would be at the command of the Government, as he ought to be, in time of war; but the chances are a thousand to one if he was offered a good place he would take it.

It is notorious that the best-manned ships we ever had were not manned by those who had technical education at a military or a naval school, but by men who got their education on the high seas. I believe that will always be the fact. I believe the men who have gone out as commanders of merchant ships will be better equipped, on the whole, than any other class of men that you can get. Certainly there is one thing about it, that practically all our fighting that has been done on the ocean in the past—except, perhaps, in this last little bit of affair that we had with Spain, which did not amount to much—has been done by the men who were common sailors on the commercial ships, men having no military training whatever. That is the class of men that I want to see taken care of, and I should like very much to see the Senator, before he allows this bill to go to a vote, offer an amendment to raise the wages of these men who are supposed to be enrolled. I think we can better afford to pay them than we can to pay the ships.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand this bill, the whole matter of regulation is left to the Secretary of the Navy. He can make a captain out of a seaman and he can make as many captains as he chooses without limitation of any kind upon his discretion in respect to the details of this arrangement.

Mr. TELLER. If the Secretary of the Navy can not do so, the President can. It is certain that somebody can. But I was suggesting that we ought to offer an inducement to the right class of men to become captains and mates of ships. If a young man makes up his mind that he is going to be a sailor, and he knows that in a certain emergency he may be called to a distinguished position of rank in the service of his country, he is a little more apt to take up that business than he would if he knew he was to remain a common sailor all his life or even if he should succeed in becoming the captain of a merchant ship. That is what I was trying to suggest.

Above all, I should like to see the sailors paid a sum sufficient to induce them to go into the service. As suggested by the Senator from Nevada, $50 on an average is not enough, in my opinion. When the Senator from New Hampshire cites Great Britain there is no parallel, because Great Britain has a different class of population, that can not secure the wages which the men in this country whom we would like to bring into this reserve can secure. I think we had better pay a million and a half dollars to that class of men than pay it out in a great many ways that we are paying it out now. We might economize somewhere else if we feel too poor to establish a good, substantial American naval reserve.

Mr. GALLINGER. On that point, Mr. President, I think I would be quite as much disposed to treat these men overgenerously as any other Senator; and it may be that the amount named is not as high as it ought to be. It is much higher than Great Britain pays. The Navy Department sent——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Allow me to finish the sentence. The Navy Department sent the schedule to me, and I called some gentlemen in conference who had to do with the construction of this bill. The Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] raised the objection that the amounts suggested by the Navy Department were too low, and under his guidance the amounts were increased and were made what they are in the bill at the present time. The Senator from Florida, I think, was satisfied—and he has a great deal of knowledge on this question; I am sorry he is detained from the Chamber by illness to-day—that these amounts would be sufficient, but if it is thought otherwise, I certainly will not resist any reasonable increase.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. The first section of the bill as amended provides for a naval reserve, as I understand, and all the sailors and officers engaged in the coasting trade and the foreign trade are eligible to become members of the naval reserve, and they are to be paid a small amount, ranging from a hundred and ten dollars, I think, to $24 a year in addition to the amount they receive from the owners of the ships on which they are working.

I should like to ask the Senator whether we are creating the naval reserve because we need it for the purpose of national defense, or are simply paying the men this amount by the Government in order to increase the wages of American sailors? Is not that the real object and purpose of this feature of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator, it is not. We are creating this reserve substantially for the same purpose that we are maintaining, at an enormous expense to the Government, the militia in the several States.

Mr. CLAY. I will ask the Senator this question. I understand the object and purpose of this legislation is to have American products carried in American bottoms to foreign countries. That is the principal object and purpose of the bill. At this time there is no general complaint that we have not a large foreign trade, but as a matter of pride we are anxious to have our manufactured products and our farm products carried in American bottoms.

I will ask the Senator why it is necessary to pay a bounty to the sailor engaged in the coasting trade? If you are trying to have your American products carried in American bottoms, why is it necessary that those engaged in the coasting trade and in the trade on the Great Lakes shall be included?

Mr. GALLINGER. For the simple reason that the naval-reserve feature of the bill has nothing whatever to do with the proposition of carrying American goods in American bottoms or of extending American trade. It is an entirely separate and distinct proposition, and it was found that if we confined the naval-reserve feature to the foreign trade, we had so few American sailors that we would not have any naval reserve.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator intend to say that the naval reserve is to be created, not with a view of helping and of developing the shipping interest of the country, but purely for purposes of national defense?

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, indirectly——

Mr. CLAY. Do I understand the Senator to say that?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it accomplishes both purposes. I think it will give us a better class of seamen, and it will give us a force of seamen who in time of emergency will be of great value to the Government. It will serve that double purpose.

The purpose of this bill is not only to carry American products in American ships, but it is to extend American trade. We have not any too much foreign trade. It is a disgrace that we have not any more foreign trade in South America, for instance, and we hope by establishing lines there, run by Americans, which, in turn, will result in the establishment of American commercial houses in those countries, to extend very much our foreign trade.

We did find, in taking testimony, that some shippers complained very bitterly that they were sustaining great losses in shipping in foreign ships; that no attention was paid to their goods when they arrived at the foreign destination; that the foreigner was more interested in goods from his own country and in affairs that concerned his own people than he was in American products, and that if there were breakages, which frequently occurred to a very large extent, they could get no redress from the foreign shipowner.

We are of the opinion that when we get American ships we will not only carry American goods, exports and imports, in American bottoms, but that those ships, sailing to countries where our trade to-day is not as great as it ought to be, will result in a greatly increased trade for the American people; and in that way we believe, or at least some of us believe, that the expenditure provided for in this bill will be paid back many fold.

Mr. CLAY. As I understand, there was not any opposition to establishing new mail routes where needed. I believe the opposition to the bill simply insisted on striking out the second, third, and fourth sections. I never heard of any opposition to the feature which had reference to establishing new mail lines where they are needed.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from New Hampshire in the expression of regret that we have not direct trade with South America, as well as with other countries, but particularly South America. Some time, a week or so, ago there was a little colloquy between the Senator from New Hampshire and myself upon this subject, in which I endeavored to bring out the fact, under the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire himself, that so far as cargo ships were concerned they were not calculated to develop trade between the United States and any given port; that they were calculated for general trade and not for the development of any special line, and that the only hope, practically speaking, of the development of trade and the establishment of new lines between this country and certain given ports where we now have no lines of transportation was in the manner contemplated in the fifth and sixth sections of the bill, providing for liberal mail compensation to be given to ships which would run between this country and those given ports.

Now, I am very much in sympathy with that part of the bill, as stated by my colleague, and I would be willing to go a very considerable length in that direction. I believe it is a matter of extreme importance that this trade should be developed; that we should have the lines of communication which would enable us to develop that trade. I am, on the contrary, not favorable to the other part of the bill, and for the purpose of giving the opportunity for a test of that question and as an earnest of good faith in the matter, stating I am willing to support this bill so far as it relates to giving a liberal mail compensation for those routes, I offer the amendment which I now send to the desk, to strike out the first four sections of the bill. I ask that it may be printed and lie on the table for action at the time contemplated by the unanimous-consent order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia offers an amendment, which will be printed.

Mr. BACON. It may be stated.

Mr. KEAN. Let it be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out from the bill sections 1, 2, 3, and 4.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the discussion of the day ends, simply as a matter of information—I do not expect thereby to change anybody's opinion concerning this bill or any feature of it—I want to read a dispatch which was sent out from Washington. It is taken from a Boston paper, and I have seen it in the New York papers, under date of February 10:

SWIFT LINE TO CHILE—CONGRESS OF THAT COUNTRY APPROPRIATES $250,000 ANNUALLY TO ESTABLISH STEAMSHIP COMPANY TO PANAMA.

WASHINGTON, February 10, 1906.

The Chilean legation has been informed that the Chilean Congress has just appropriated $250,000 annually for a steamship line to establish more direct communication between Valparaiso, Chile, and Panama. The trip now takes twenty-two to twenty-four days, because ships make frequent and long stops in towns on the coasts of Chile and Peru.

It is the intention of the Chilean Government that ships shall make the trip in a much shorter time, thereby establishing a much more rapid connection with New Orleans and New York and other American harbors.

This shows that poor little Chile is ready to spend a quarter of a million dollars a year to establish a line of steamships to extend her commerce. I have the profoundest hope and expectation that this great country of ours, which has wealth in excess of the combined wealth of England and France of $5,000,000,000, will not haggle a great while about giving some aid to our shipping, so that we may extend our commerce to foreign countries.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will note that the particular enterprise upon which Chile is about to enter is of the very class I have just alluded to as that which I would myself prefer.

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely.

Mr. BACON. It is the establishment of lines of transportation between given points.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I am willing to assist properly in that direction.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not read this item in criticism of anything the Senator said.

Mr. BACON. I understand.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand the Senator's position.

Mr. BACON. But I desired, as the Senator gave such a fine opportunity, to make application of it in support of the suggestion I made.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am delighted to have the Senator's support for half the bill. I hope he will see additional light and vote for the bill in its entirety to-morrow at 5 o'clock.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, there has been handed to me at my desk a letter from the president of the American Federation of Labor, having reference to something in the pending bill, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The communication referred to is as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., February 13, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: The Senate of the United States has before it and under consideration S. 529, commonly known as the "subsidy bill." Bills of a similar character before previous Congresses have been given considerable attention by the working people of our country and their views expressed thereon, and particularly is this so in reference to the principle involved as well as certain features of the bill in the third session of the last Congress, being H. R. 17098. Comparison and perusal of this bill with S. 529 shows a marked similarity in purpose, method, and principle, and it is both the presentation to you and through you to the Senate of the United States that I am impelled to address this letter to you.

October, 1905, Mr. Daniel J. Keefe, president of the International Longshoremen's Association and vice-president of the American Federation of Labor, requested an opinion from me upon the subsidy bill (H. R. 17098), and because a perusal of my reply to him and because I am convinced that in effect the reply applies equally to the present subsidy bill (S. 529) I quote that letter herein. It is as follows:

"Thus far I have been unable to write one word of my reports, the other work requiring so much of my attention. In spite of being overwhelmingly busy, I have tried to comply with the request contained in your favor of October 12 in regard to the Grosvenor bill, H. R. 17098, of the Fifty-eighth Congress, third session, being a bill on the merchant marine and fisheries, commonly known as the 'subsidy bill.'

"I have also read the report of the committee, Report No. 4136, Fifty-eighth Congress, third session, House of Representatives, and which accompanied H. R. 17098. Of course I do not pretend to say that I have thoroughly digested the provisions of the bill and report. To make any such claim would be futile, because it would require thorough study to entitle one to reach conclusions upon which one can so definitely assert.

"However, from a casual reading and a fair conception of their purport, as well as some experience with measures of this character, I submit to you the following tentative conclusions, which were forced upon my mind, or, rather, I submit the following for your consideration in connection with this subject:

"In connection therewith I need not, however, mention the fact that the American Federation of Labor has repeatedly and almost unanimously declared against the ship-subsidy bills that have been introduced in the various Federal Congresses. I only need briefly call your attention to the few points to which I shall refer.

"You will observe on page 5 of the bill, from line 13 to 16, inclusive, there is a provision that if one-sixth of the crew are American citizens of the United States, or men who have declared their intention to become citizens, that the vessel shall be entitled to subvention. In other words, five-sixths of the crew may not only be aliens, but could be Asiatics, and in view of the fact that the tendency of the ship companies, like other employers, is toward a desire to get the cheapest possible labor, it is not difficult to understand that the shipping companies receiving this subsidy would hire as many of the aliens as possible—that is, five-sixths of the crew—at a low wage, and through this means endeavor to force down the wages of the one-sixth of the crew necessary to be employed to entitle it to the subsidy.

"On page 6 of the bill you will find a provision that a vessel shall not be entitled to the subsidy unless the members of the crew shall be enrolled as naval volunteers, and on page 2 of the bill it provides that they shall be 'enrolled for a period of three years, during which they shall be subject to render service on call of the President in time of war.'

"One can readily see that the shipping masters will make the enrollment into the naval volunteer service a condition precedent to such employment, and that the failure or refusal of a seaman to enroll as a volunteer in the Navy, and subject to a call in time of war, will be sufficient cause for shipping masters to refuse to give these men employment at all.

"Of course every American must feel, and should feel, that in time of need Americans should readily respond to the call for troops on land or sea to defend the interests and honor of our country, but I believe you will agree with me that when a man's employment in times of peace depends upon his enlistment in either the Army or the Navy that such a provision is tantamount to compulsory enlistment, and practically constitutes conscription.

"Then, again, on pages 11 and 12 you will find that a tax or duty is imposed upon foreign vessels carrying products to the United States of from 8 cents to 16 cents tonnage per year. It is not difficult to discern that every cent of such taxation will be placed upon the products which the people of the United States will have to pay on every article they consume, at any rate during the period from the enactment of the bill until every article brought from a foreign country is brought in ships flying our flag. And surely between such period and the entire carrying of foreign trade by American vessels a considerable time will elapse.

"In the entire bill there is not one provision that makes one solitary gain for the men who make their living by going down to the sea in ships.

"In the report of the committee a pious wish is expressed that other committees of Congress should take this matter into consideration, but these perfunctory declarations mean little or nothing. If the committee had any idea for the improvement of the condition of the seamen, they certainly could have drafted it in the bill they had under consideration.

"I regret that I have not any more time to devote to the consideration of this matter, but the above is submitted to your careful consideration as the conclusions reached at the first flush after reading and noting the contents of the bill and the report of the committee. You will, of course, understand that I am not an expert in maritime affairs. I speak from the standpoint of the layman who has had some little experience in dealing with matters of this character, and in that spirit and understanding I ask you to accept it for what it is worth."

Omit from this quoted letter the word "volunteer" and substitute the words of the present bill, "naval reserve," and the applicability will thus be obvious.

It may not be amiss to call attention to the fact that on page 4, lines 6 to 9, in accordance with the provisions therein stated, the seamen coming under the operation of the bill, if it were enacted into law, would, while employed by private concerns, still be subject to such orders and regulations as the Government, through its Secretary of the Navy, may prescribe, again making conscription practically absolute as a condition for the employment of a seaman on a private vessel.

On page 5, lines 3 to 11, the following language occurs:

"Such retainer shall be paid at the end of each year of service on certificate, by an officer to be designated by the Secretary of the Navy, that the member of the Naval Reserve has satisfactorily complied with the regulations, and, on certificate by the Commissioner of Navigation, that such member has served satisfactorily for at least six months of the preceding twelve months on vessels of the United States in the merchant marine or in the deep-sea fisheries."

In other words, this provision of the bill makes the seaman who has entered in the Naval Reserve dependent upon the whim and fancy, favoritism and displeasure of his private employer before even the seaman may receive the Government's largess.

Without discussing further the general principles of the bill, it appeals to me with irresistible force that the particular features of the bill to which I have addressed myself should commend themselves sufficiently strong to you, so that they may act as a protest against their enactment into law.

The workmen of America love our country, and there are no more loyal in all the masses of the people than are those who are enrolled in the membership of the trade unions of our country. It is in their name that I address you, and suggest further that wisdom and foresight and patriotism, as well as economy, should suggest a definite method by which men, American by birth, citizenship, or sympathy may be recruited from the merchant marine of America for the naval strength of our country in times of stress and war as well as in peace.

Very respectfully, yours,

SAML. GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk with amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13548) to authorize the commissioners' court of Baldwin County, Ala., to construct a bridge across Perdido River at Waters Ferry.

The bill was read at length.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WILEY of Alabama, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title:

S. R. 32. Joint resolution instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examinations into the subject of railroad discriminations and monopolies, and report on the same from time to time.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution (S. R. 32) instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examinations into the subject of railroad discriminations and monopolies, and report on the same from time to time—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

BRIDGE ACROSS ARKANSAS RIVER, VAN BUREN, ARK.

Mr. REID. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill. Without objection, the Clerk will read the substitute.

Mr. REID. Mr. Speaker, before the reading of the bill, I want to call attention to the fact there is a proviso left in the bill which was left in inadvertently. It will be found on page 7, lines 23 to 25, inclusive. The bill as reported was intended to be in accordance with one previously passed by the House, but that provision was left in there by inadvertence.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I understood the Chair asked whether there was objection to the consideration of the bill. The bill has not been read, or even the title.

Mr. REID. The bill conforms exactly to a bill which passed the House a few days ago, and that proviso is asked to be stricken out to make it conform in that respect to that bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I think we should have the bill read.

Mr. REID. That is the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2106) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at or near Van Buren, Ark.

The substitute was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. REID. Mr. Speaker, in order to make the bill conform exactly to the requirements, I would ask unanimous consent to strike out the provision on page 7, lines 23 to 25, inclusive. This proviso was inadvertently put in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. REID. Also, on page 9, in line 13, strike out the word "two" and insert "one." Also, in line 14 strike out "five" and insert "three."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read the third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. REID, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COINAGE, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures be authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be required in the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REPRINT OF BILL.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask for a reprint of the bill (H. R. 8988) to fix the standard of weights and measures by the adoption of the metric system of weights and measures.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for reprint of the bill H. R. 7980. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

NEW JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8977) to create a new division of the western judicial district of Texas and to provide for terms of court at Del Rio, Tex., and for a clerk for said court, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the counties of Uvalde, Zavalla, Maverick, Kinney, Edwards, Valverde, Terrell, Pecos, and Brewster shall constitute a division of the western judicial district of Texas.

SEC. 2. That terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the said western district of Texas shall be held twice in each year at the city of Del Rio, in Valverde County, and that, until otherwise provided by law, the judges of said courts shall fix the times at which said courts shall be held at Del Rio, of which they shall make publication and give due notice.

SEC. 3. That all civil process issued against persons resident in the said counties of Uvalde, Zavalla, Maverick, Kinney, Edwards, Valverde, Terrell, Pecos, and Brewster, and cognizable before the United States courts, shall be made returnable to the courts, respectively, to be held at the city of Del Rio, and all prosecutions for offenses committed in any of said counties shall be tried in the appropriate United States court at the city of Del Rio: Provided, That no process issued or prosecution commenced or suit instituted before the passage of this bill shall be in any way affected by the provisions hereof.

SEC. 4. That the clerks of the circuit and district courts of said division shall maintain an office, in charge of themselves or a deputy, at the said city of Del Rio, which shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of said division.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if there is any public building lurking around in this bill anywhere?

Mr. GARNER. I would say to the gentleman from New York that there is not just at this time.

Mr. PAYNE. But that is the final goal?

Mr. GARNER. No; I can not say that it is.

Mr. PAYNE. Is there any other reason for the bill except that?

Mr. GARNER. Oh, yes; there is no question about that.

Mr. PAYNE. I wish the gentleman would state it.

Mr. GARNER. The people in that section have to travel from 100 to 420 miles to get to court at the present time in the territory embraced in this bill.

Mr. PAYNE. How much would the distance be shortened by this bill?

Mr. GARNER. From 35 to 250 miles. There are nine counties embraced in the bill, and it will be of great advantage to the Government in the saving of fees of witnesses in attendance at the court.

Mr. PAYNE. Is there any place now where they can hold the court?

Mr. GARNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. Where is it?

Mr. GARNER. The county court-house.

Mr. PAYNE. Do they get free use of that?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope the House will confine them to that.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "Edwards" and "Brewster" wherever they occur in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GARNER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE ST. FRANCIS RIVER.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13568) to authorize the Campbell Lumber Company to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River, in Clay County, Ark., at or near the point where the section line between sections 23 and 26 in township 20 north, range 9 east, touches said river.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill in full.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MACON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TRANSPORTATION OF THE MAILS.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a privileged resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE] desires to offer a privileged resolution. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the House, at his earliest convenience, a comparative statement showing the cost to the Government for the transportation of the mails per ton per mile by the railroads and the cost of transporting express matter per ton per mile by the railroads.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's motion?

Mr. GILLESPIE. I move that the committee be discharged from the consideration of the resolution and that it be put upon its passage.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order that is is not privileged. It calls for an investigation by the Post-Office Department.

The SPEAKER. The Chair notices that this resolution provides that the Postmaster-General be requested to furnish the House, at his earliest convenience, a comparative statement showing the cost to the Government for the transportation of mails per ton per mile by the railroads, and the cost of transporting express matter per ton per mile by the railroads. The doubt in the mind of the Chair is that this calls for information touching a matter that is not at all under the Postmaster-General, so far as express matter is concerned; and therefore, it would seem that if the resolution were to be adopted, that it would set on foot an investigation in the Post-Office Department. The Chair will hear the gentleman upon the proposition as to whether the latter clause, covering the cost of transporting express matter per ton per mile, does not destroy the privileged character of the resolution.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, it only calls for that information provided it is in possession of the Postmaster-General, and goes to the merit of the resolution rather than its privileged character. If he has not that information he will report that he has not got it and that will end the matter.

The SPEAKER. Ah; but it seems to the Chair, and the Chair suggests to the gentleman that the language goes further—that he furnish the House at his earliest convenience a comparative statement showing the cost for transporting mails and the cost of transporting express matter. Now, it might be assumed that if he does not have the information he will so report; but it will also be assumed that he will be required to enter into an inquiry that might detail much of expense or might not. It is not for the Chair to pass upon that matter. The only thing the Chair has to pass upon is, when the point of order is made, as to whether taking the two together destroys the privilege of the first. Much of inference here has to be indulged in before the point of order could be overruled.

Mr. PAYNE. May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the latter part of the resolution being nonprivileged matter, of course it destroys the privilege of the resolution, according to uniform rulings heretofore. The information as to express companies can not be assumed or presumed to be in the knowledge of the Postmaster-General, for that Department has nothing to do with that. On the contrary, the presumption is they know nothing about it and must make an investigation. Now, that calls for something besides information; it calls for an investigation by the Department; and that being nonprivileged destroys the privileged character of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas. The Chair must take notice, as each Member must take notice, somewhat of the various Departments of the Government charged with administration of law. Now, the Chair knows that by a general provision of law certain duties devolve upon the Post-Office Department and certain duties upon the Department of Commerce and Labor and certain other duties on the Treasury Department and certain other duties upon a commission that is not under any Department, as the Interstate Commerce Commission. So that any ruling the Chair might make necessarily involves something of knowledge of the organization of the Government. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, upon the line suggested by the Chair: Is it not proper to state that when the Postmaster-General has to make these contracts with the railroads for carrying the mail he would investigate what kind of a contract he should make? And he certainly has data properly bearing upon this subject in his possession.

The SPEAKER. Just at that point—because the gentleman from Texas and the Chair are at one about this resolution—the Chair must take notice that contracts with the railways are regulated by law, and the service is performed without regard to a contract, when it is performed at all, by the railway, of course, and when the service is performed the compensation, whether under contract or without contract, is absolutely controlled by statute.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, on the proposition raised by the gentleman from New York I understand the rule to be that a resolution upon its face must call for an investigation in order to destroy the privileged character. Now, if you arrive at that by argument or inference, that does not destroy the privileged character of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. On the contrary, the Chair suggests to the gentleman that he must resort to argument to sustain the privileged character of the resolution.

Mr. GILLESPIE. I believe the rule just the other way, Mr. Speaker, with all due deference to the Speaker.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. GILLESPIE. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi such time as he needs to discuss the point.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, this resolution requests the Postmaster-General to furnish a comparative statement showing the cost to the Government—that is, the actual cost now—from data necessarily in the possession of the Postmaster-General. It requires nothing, as I understand it, except the collocating of information now in the possession of the Post-Office Department—the cost to the Government for the transportation of the mails per ton per mile, and the cost of transporting express matter per ton per mile, by the railroads. The Postmaster-General has in his possession the information showing the number of tons and the cost both of the express matter and of the transportation of the mails in the ordinary way along the railroads. Undoubtedly if it required an investigation in order to arrive at the facts to be reported to the House the point made by the gentleman from New York would be well taken, but this does not necessarily require that. It not only does not necessarily require it, but it does not properly or incidentally require it. All that is asked of the Postmaster-General is such information as he has. There is no request that he make an investigation to get other information at all, as I understand this resolution. I have read it hastily, because this is the first time I have seen it. My attention was not called to it. Perhaps it might have been made a little bit plainer by saying "a comparative statement from data now in his possession," and if that point is made I have no doubt the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE] would be perfectly willing to put in those words; but it seems to me it is not necessary that they should be put in, because that is what the resolution naturally and without any forced or strained construction must mean.

Mr. GILLESPIE rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, I can only say that if the House should entertain the resolution upon its merits I would agree to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that the resolution, requesting the Postmaster-General to report the cost to the Government of transporting the mails per ton per mile by the railroads, if it stopped there, would be a privileged resolution under the rule; but when it adds "and the cost of transporting express matter per ton per mile by the railroads," it does not cover a question of privilege under the rule, and it is only the question of privilege that is to be considered. The gentleman arises in his place and makes his motion to discharge the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads from further consideration of this resolution, because, a week having elapsed since it was referred to that committee, it has not reported the same back. In other words, the rule enables the gentleman, if he has the proper case under the rule, to halt the consideration of all other resolutions that are not privileged and the ordinary business of the House, and to halt the House in the consideration of business upon the Calendars from the various committees, and dispose of this resolution by virtue of this rule. Now, if the motion does not prevail and it is not a question of privilege, the resolution remains with the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads for disposition under the rules of the House, the same as other business.

Now, the uniform ruling of the Chair in former Congresses and in this Congress has been by construction not to enlarge the matter of privilege in these cases. It does seem, following the precedents for the orderly transaction of business in the House, that the construction holding the resolution privileged should be strict, and in the opinion of the Chair the latter clause of the resolution is not privileged and vitiates the resolution as a question of privilege. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

UNITED STATES COURT, DUNCAN, IND. T.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 436) establishing a United States court and recording district at Duncan, Ind. T., and conforming other districts therewith.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in addition to the places now provided by law for holding courts in the southern judicial district of Indian Territory courts shall be held in the town of Duncan, and all laws regulating the holding of the courts in the Indian Territory shall be applicable to the said court hereby created in the said town of Duncan.

SEC. 2. That the territory described in this section shall be known as recording district No. 27, beginning at a point where township line between townships 2 and 3 north reaches the east boundary line of Oklahoma Territory; thence east on said township line 24 miles to where it intersects with range line 3 and 4 west; thence south on said range line 12 miles to where it intersects the base line between townships 1 north and 1 south; thence east along said base line 6 miles to the range line between ranges 2 and 3 west; thence south 12 miles along said range line to the township line between townships 2 and 3 south; thence west 30 miles along said township line to where it intersects with the east line of Oklahoma Territory; thence north along said line 24 miles to the place of beginning.

SEC. 3. That the present boundaries of recording district No. 18, in the Indian Territory, is hereby amended so as to read as follows: Beginning at a point at the South Canadian River where the same intersects the range line between ranges 3 and 4 east; thence south on said range line to a section line 3 miles south of the township line between townships 4 and 5 north; thence west on said line to the meridian line between ranges 4 and 5 west; thence north on said meridian line to the South Canadian River; thence down said South Canadian River, following the meanderings thereof, to the place of beginning. The place of record for district No. 18 shall be Purcell.

SEC. 4. That the present boundaries of recording district No. 17, in the Indian Territory, is hereby amended so as to read as follows: Beginning at a point 3 miles south of the township line between townships 4 and 5 north where said line intersects with the range line between ranges 3 and 4 east; thence south along said range line to the base line; thence west on said base line to the meridian line between ranges 4 and 5 west; thence north on said meridian line to a section line 3 miles south of the township line between townships 4 and 5 north; thence east on said section line to the place of beginning. The place of record for district No. 17 shall be Pauls Valley.

SEC. 5. That it is further provided that all the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 19, 1903, shall apply to districts Nos. 17, 18, and 27 where applicable. That all laws or parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman what committee reports this bill?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is unanimously reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. This was the only bill that was left over from yesterday on the call of that committee. The bill would have been the next one to come up.

Mr. PAYNE. The Judiciary Committee can call it up on the call of committees.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Their call has been exhausted. I understand they have had their two days already, and it would be impossible now for them to call this bill up. It is the only one that was left on their calendar.

Mr. PAYNE. Is there any special haste for this legislation?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No; except this bill has passed the House twice and failed, for want of time, to pass the Senate. There is no objection to it whatever.

Mr. PAYNE. It has never been considered at either time, has it?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It was considered when it passed the House. It was considered by the committee both times, and by the House. There was some discussion about it. I will state to the gentleman that this lays off three districts 30 miles square on the Rock Island Railroad on the west side of the Indian Territory. Along the Santa Fe road there are four courts, while on the Rock Island there are only two. There is 100 miles scope of country there with only two courts, one near the Red River and another one near the northern boundary, lying about 80 miles apart. This will divide the distance and give Duncan a court, and leave the intervening space only 40 miles. Three-quarters of the business goes from Duncan to the other courts, and it is unfair to the people. It will be a saving to the United States Government with no expense to the Government. The same clerks will have charge. United States Judge Thompson has recommended the passage of the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the bill create a new county and a new county seat?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Only a recording district. We have no counties in the Indian Territory, and that is the reason why we have the boundaries laid off. In place of counties we have recording districts, and the recording district and the court district is the same.

Mr. PAYNE. That is a local court?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. A local court, and the United States judge requests Congress to pass the bill. There will be a saving to the United States Government in the way of witness fees. This town has three or four thousand people, and is the largest town on the line, except Chickasha, which now has a court.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think bills of this character ought to come up in the regular way, but I will not interpose any objection to the bill this morning.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas a question.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. Is this not the same bill that there was trouble about in the Fifty-seventh Congress, where, after the Speaker's signature was attached to it, it had to be canceled and withdrawn?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think it is.

Mr. LACEY. Ought not this bill to be considered by the Committee on Territories, as it makes practically a new county?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I can not say whether the Committee on Territories ought to have it or not, but the Judiciary Committee has always passed on these bills for new places to hold courts.

Mr. LACEY. Which committee passed upon it in the Fifty-seventh Congress?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think the Judiciary Committee did. When a bill is introduced creating a court or changing the place for holding a court, it is always sent to the Judiciary Committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote was laid on the table.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14171) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes; and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to three hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the other half by myself.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested that for the present no agreement as to time be made, and that perhaps we can get through quicker.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Inasmuch as an agreement can not be made unless we make it now, I will ask the gentleman if he will not consent to a slightly longer time. We have no one on this side who wishes to speak except on the bill itself, and it is not our purpose to have general debate on other subjects.

Mr. FITZGERALD. One or two gentlemen have suggested that they might wish to speak on this bill, and perhaps they will not use any time at all.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will not the gentleman consent to three and a half hours?

Mr. FITZGERALD. As far as I am concerned, unless some gentleman on this side wishes to occupy some time, I have no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If the gentleman will agree to three hours or three and a half I will agree to grant some time from this side to gentlemen on that side if they require it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That will be satisfactory to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to three and one-half hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the other half by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. SMITH of Iowa was then agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the fortifications appropriation bill, with Mr. CURRIER in the chair.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. MCNARY. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

During the reading of the bill,

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws his objection. Without objection, the Clerk will dispense with the further reading of the bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, before addressing myself to the details of the bill now pending, I desire to call attention briefly to the methods by which money may be drawn from the Federal Treasury. There are three distinct kinds, or classes, of laws under which money may be paid out of the Treasury.

First. Laws making ordinary annual appropriations. These are only available for contracts made or expenses actually incurred during the fiscal year for which such appropriations are made, and under the so-called "covering-in act" of 1874 are not so available after two years from the end of the fiscal year.

Second. Laws providing for what are called continuing appropriations, which provide that the money appropriated shall be available until expended. Of this character are the appropriations for rivers and harbors, for public buildings under the Treasury and at Soldiers' Homes, for the pay of the Navy and Marine Corps for the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made, for fortifications, and all those laws which specially provide that the money appropriated shall be available until expended; laws with reference to life-saving stations always contain this provision. The provision of the Constitution that Congress shall not appropriate money for the support of an Army for more than two years is not held to be applicable to appropriations for fortifications.

Third. Laws providing for what are called "permanent appropriations." Permanent appropriations are of two classes, definite and indefinite. Definite permanent appropriations may be illustrated by the standing appropriation of $5,500,000 a year for the collection of customs duties. The Secretary of the Treasury is annually entitled to take that sum and spend it in the collection of customs without any appropriating act by Congress. There are other definite permanent appropriations, but this is illustrative of the class. There are two types of indefinite permanent appropriations.

There are acts providing that all the receipts from a specific source may be utilized for a given purpose; these are indefinite, because it is uncertain what the receipts will be, as, for example, it is provided that the head tax of $2 apiece upon immigrants may be used so far as necessary for the payment of the expenses of the Immigration Service. This appropriation is indefinite for two reasons: It is indefinite because it is uncertain what the receipts will be from the head tax and uncertain how much the Department will deem it necessary to expend of those receipts. A second class of indefinite permanent appropriations is to be found in those laws which provide that certain expenses of the Government may be paid out of the Treasury, and it is uncertain as to what those expenses will amount to. This last type may be illustrated in this way: If an American diplomatic or consular officer starts to his station in a foreign land he is entitled to pay from the time he starts, and the man who is returning is entitled to pay until he arrives here. This overlap of pay of diplomatic and consular officers is allowed to be paid out of the Treasury without any act appropriating the money therefor. Among other of these indefinite permanent appropriations may be found the provision for the sinking fund and the payment of the interest upon the public debt. The expenditures from the Treasury under so-called "permanent appropriations" amount now to $140,000,000 a year and more. The various committees of this House with authority to bring in appropriation bills have nothing to do with past expenditures, save as information upon that subject throws light on future needs. Their primary duty is to ascertain what is needed for the future, not what has been done with past appropriations. Of course, information upon that subject is highly instructive as to what is actually needed for the future, but this Government is now expending about $800,000,000 a year, or about $660,000,000 aside from that expended on the permanent appropriations. Of this, about $640,000,000 are on reports from the four committees—on Military Affairs, on Naval Affairs, on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and the Committee on Appropriations.

It is beyond the power of these committees unaided to fully examine in detail all the past expenditures of the various Departments, and in addition perform their primary duty of ascertaining the amount needed for the future. While the committees make a cursory examination of what has been done with the funds heretofore appropriated for the subjects under consideration by these committees, as we do not have to appropriate the money used in paying the more than $140,000,000 on what are called "permanent appropriations," no committee makes any investigation whatever of the expenditures under the permanent appropriation laws. We have a cursory examination of expenditures under the annual appropriation bills, a similar investigation of appropriations available until expended, and none at all of the expenditure of $140,000,000 a year under the permanent appropriation laws of Congress. Rule X of this House provides for the appointment of ten committees of seven members each, one on expenditures in each of the Executive Departments, and one on expenditures on public buildings. Rule XI provides that all proposed legislation—the subjects relating to the examination of the accounts and expenditures of the several Departments of the Government and the manner of keeping the same, the economy, justness, and correctness of such expenditures, their conformity with appropriation laws, the proper application of public moneys, the security of the Government against unjust and extravagant demands, retrenchment, the enforcement of the payment of moneys due to the United States, the economy and accountability of public officers, the abolishment of useless offices, the reduction or increase of the pay of officers—shall all be subjects within the jurisdiction of the nine standing committees on the public expenditures in the several Departments.

The language of this rule leaves us gravely in doubt about whether it was contemplated that these committees should do more than consider proposed legislation on subjects within their jurisdiction. Whatever may have been the original purpose, these committees have long since ceased to be regarded as charged with the duty of conducting any investigation of the expenditures in the Departments. If under suitable amendment to the rules these committees should be specifically charged to annually investigate all expenditures of the Departments and report to the House, misappropriation and extravagance would be speedily discovered and done away with. The House was astonished a few days ago to find that the Attorney-General had authorized an expenditure of about $2,600 out of the contingent fund of his Department for the purchase of an oil painting of his predecessor; but if these committees on expenditures in the Departments were vitalized, as I have suggested, and performed their functions, this House would know that the Attorney-General was simply following a practice of his predecessors for years, and simply following the practice of the head of every Executive Department of this Government for years; that not only have paintings been purchased of Cabinet officers out of the contingent fund, but of important subordinate officers in the Departments, until to-day in the older Departments the oil paintings—alleged works of art, supposed to portray the features of long-forgotten statesmen—have so accumulated that they have to hang them in double and triple tiers upon the walls; and the question is now, not where to get expensive oil paintings to decorate the walls, but where to get walls on which to hang the oil paintings. [Applause.] The time has arrived when this Government, with its $800,000,000 of annual expenditures, should authorize somebody representing the Congress as the appropriating power to examine, investigate, and report the expenditures of the appropriations that we make. [Applause.]

If these committees on expenditures in Departments can not be vitalized, then some other system must be devised by which the Congress shall be advised as to how well and how faithfully these vast sums are expended by the officers in whose charge we place them. But not only would the vitalizing of these committees and making of each a standing inquisition of one of these Departments confer the benefits I have suggested, but their work, if well done, would be of incalculable benefit to the appropriating committees of this House in determining what amount should be given for future needs.

In the fortifications act of March 3, 1885, passed in the closing hours of the Forty-eighth Congress, it was provided that the President appoint a board consisting of the Secretary of War as president, two engineer officers, two ordnance officers, two naval officers, and two civilians (which subsequently became known as the "Endicott board," after Hon. William C. Endicott, Secretary of War), which board was to report where fortifications or other defenses were most urgently required and the kind and character of defense best adapted for each and the utilization of mines or other defensive appliances. This board reported to the Forty-ninth Congress January 26, 1886, but that Congress made no appropriation to carry out the plans of the board. The general plans of the Endicott board have been followed ever since, and Congress has every year since 1888 made more or less liberal appropriations to carry those plans into effect. In the twenty years since the report of the Endicott board vast changes have taken place in the approved styles of heavy guns and the ammunition used, which has revolutionized the methods of construction of batteries, and those and other changes led the President on January 31, 1905, to appoint a new board, with the Secretary of War at its head, to revise the plans of the Endicott board. This new board, known as the "Taft board," has not yet filed its report, but it is understood it will do so within a very few days.

This report will cover the insular possessions, as well as continental United States, and the estimates will probably for that reason exceed those of the Endicott board. It is estimated that the Endicott scheme, complete, would cost $99,392,222. Since it was adopted we have appropriated for fortifications $119,102,483.32, or nearly $20,000,000 more than the whole estimated cost; but only $64,094,042.24 has actually been expended under the scheme, and the difference of $55,008,441.08 has been expended for gun factories, sites for fortifications, torpedoes, ammunition for service, test and practice, field guns, insular fortifications, and sundry other items. Because of the fact the appropriations for fortifications are available until expended, your committee deemed it their duty to ascertain how much was still unexpended under every item carried in the fortifications bill, and the accumulation of appropriations for the past eighteen years.

And it was discovered that the Treasury balances under the various fortification bills heretofore passed amount to $8,356,245 more than any year's appropriation since the close of the Spanish war. This being, however, a line in which considerable time is required between appropriations and the final completion of the work, a balance is necessary, of some amount, to be always on hand. A gun such as is used on a modern fortification requires approximately two years to construct, and, of course, the work can not be commenced on it until appropriation is made. And so while we have diligently studied to find what balances remain on hand under every item of this bill, we do not wish to be understood that because we found a balance equal to an annual appropriation that that shows no appropriation is at all necessary this year. The committee finding, however, this large balance of money already appropriated, the expenditure of which in the Government's gun shops will keep them busy for a considerable time, desirous of presenting a bill which should be as moderate as possible upon the one hand and still carry on the work of the fortification of our seaports upon the other, has presented for the consideration of the House a bill which appropriates $4,838,993, far the smallest fortification bill presented to the House in the ten years since 1896.

Mr. ESCH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. ESCH. Was the gentleman's committee persuaded in making these reductions by the fact that the present coast defenses were undermanned, and that to continue fortifications would simply lead to the increase of the Artillery Corps?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If the gentleman will ask me that question in a moment, I will be glad to answer it.

Mr. ESCH. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I say the appropriation recommended is the smallest in ten years, or since 1896—almost two millions below last year's bill, and more than four millions below the estimates of the War Department, and nearly $600,000 below the average appropriations for the past eighteen years. In this bill $3,751,993 are appropriated for continental United States and $1,087,000 for insular United States.

Turning now to the question propounded by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], I may say that the question of the fortification of the ports of the United States involves this difficulty: I have already stated that the Endicott scheme contemplated the expenditure of about $100,000,000, not a great sum to be expended in a period of twenty years. But unfortunately it appears that to man this Endicott scheme of fortifications, with each man theoretically serving twenty-four hours with no relief, would require about 38,000 men. Information as to the report of the Taft board is not yet official, but I am justified in saying that under the report of the Taft board the fortification of continental and insular United States would cost about $106,000,000; that the fortifications when completed would require about 46,000 or 47,000 men to man them, each man serving twenty-four hours. The average expense carried in the army bill per man is about $1,100, as I now recall it.

An artillery branch of the service sufficient to man continental and insular fortifications, as contemplated by the Taft board, would put an annual charge upon the people of $50,000,000. So that the mere question of appropriating four or five millions a year for the advancement of the work of construction becomes of comparative insignificance as compared with this incurring of the necessity for the annual expenditure of $50,000,000 for the skeleton artillery formation to hold the works. Not only that, but I think I am correct—and the gentleman who is upon the Committee on Military Affairs will set me right if I am wrong—the artillery branch now provided for is about 18,000 men, and that it is over 4,000 men short in the actual number of enlistments.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman mean the artillery branch?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I mean the artillery branch.

Mr. KAHN. The entire Army is about 4,000 short.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And is not that all in the artillery, according to the returns?

Mr. KAHN. That I do not know; I do not think so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the statement of the Chief of Artillery is exactly as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] has said.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. For some reason the shortage in enlistments in all the branches of the Army is found to be, substantially all of it, in the artillery branch. We are not able to man the fortifications we have now. But that perhaps is not a sufficient reason for not finishing them and keeping them modernized and up to date.

In many of the places the War Department has practically no men—simply a handful to keep the guns and machinery from deterioration; and this practically means that the existing fortifications would be of no use in time of need unless furnished with men not now in the service. So this committee, anxious that the country shall be reasonably prepared, but unwilling to crowd this work on and impose, not the slight cost of construction, but this enormous cost of maintenance, anxious at this time, when there is little of surplus revenue, if any, to be modest in its demands, has presented this bill.

Mr. GRAFF. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. GRAFF. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa what the conditions of our fortifications are now with reference to efficiency as compared with the fortifications of any of the great European powers?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. In some respects they are in a superior condition to those of any other power in the world. We have now completed about two-thirds of the Endicott scheme, and have fortified all the principal points in continental United States. We have equipped those fortifications with the most modern guns. We have made, last year and this, a considerable appropriation to keep them modern. We have equipped them with a modern system of fire control which does not exist in the fortifications of any other power, an improvement which it is claimed by artillery officers increases their efficiency from 100 to 400 per cent.

I have thus briefly outlined the general character of this bill, and I rejoice to state that as to the great body of it the bill meets with the unanimous approval of all the members of the Committee on Appropriations. There is one item of this bill upon which a minority report has been filed, and upon that I desire to speak but briefly at this time.

From the time that we commenced to fortify our coast we have invariably made an appropriation of a gross sum for sites, a gross sum for batteries, a gross sum for guns. We have in no instance specifically mentioned the site or place where the money was to be expended. It is regarded as extremely unwise to notify all the nations of the earth just how extensive and complete are your fortifications at each specific point upon your coast, and for that reason, and because the War Department knows better than Congress as to how extensive the fortifications should be at each given point, we have always appropriated a gross sum and trusted to the War Department to expend it wisely in the proper locality. That policy has been a successful policy. No portion of this country claims that it has been neglected by the War Department in the distribution of these funds. I have never heard of any complaints upon that subject, and the policy has been one in harmony with the policy of every people upon that subject.

When the insular possessions came to be considered, we at first did the same for them. We appropriated a gross sum for sites in the insular possessions, another for batteries in the insular possessions, and a third for guns in the insular possessions. This year the bill has been slightly modified, because the committee did not think it wise to further expend money at present at Guantanamo; and so in place of the bill reading that certain sums are appropriated for the insular possessions for batteries it reads: That $600,000 is appropriated for batteries for the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Most certainly.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Does the gentleman think it right, and will he state, if he does, how much of that $600,000 will go to the Philippine Islands? I thought it was the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is $600,000 for the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands. I am not able to state, but I think about $200,000.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Only $200,000 goes to the Philippine Islands?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. To the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. DRISCOLL. And the other $400,000 goes to the Philippine Islands?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think that will be the action of the War Department, but I do not know.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is there anything in this appropriation which will commit this Government in any way to the selection of a permanent naval station in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not one thing. The War Department is charged with the responsibility of determining where the greatest emergency for fortifications is in the Philippine Islands, and if this House and the Senate should vote to put up a naval plant at Subig Bay, then the War Department would fortify Subig Bay.

It depends upon the action of Congress with reference to the proposed project at Subig Bay whether a dollar of this money would ever be expended there or not. I think the War Department ought to do in these islands just as it did in the continental United States—that is, determine where the emergency is and spend the money that we give it there. I think I am not more modest than most men, and I think the War and Navy Departments together will be able to determine the places which need fortifications in the Philippines better than the Members of this Congress, and I know they are more capable than myself.

Mr. FINLEY. Is the gentleman able to state about what amount of money will be necessary to fortify the Hawaiian Islands properly?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. About $2,000,000, I think.

Mr. FINLEY. Does the gentleman think that will secure efficient and permanent fortifications?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It would for the protection of Honolulu and Pearl Harbor, which are the only places that it is contemplated to fortify.

Mr. FINLEY. I hope the gentleman realizes the importance of those islands being fortified, and I am concerned to know whether or not the amount carried in this bill is reasonable to satisfy the demand for the present.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that this bill carries for the Hawaiian Islands for sites every dollar that was asked by the War Department, and that it contains in other items, not specifying those islands, the complete estimates of the War Department for the fortification of the Hawaiian Islands. Every dollar asked for Hawaii was put in, as we understood it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, how much money does this bill carry for the Philippine Islands?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This bill does not carry any sum for the Philippine Islands. This bill carries $600,000 for seacoast batteries in the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands. It carries $200,000 for guns in the insular possessions. It carries $100,000 for ammunition for reserve in the insular possessions, and there is not one dollar appropriated in this bill specifically for the Philippine Islands.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. All told for the two colonies the amount is $600,000?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. For seacoast batteries for the Hawaiian Islands and the Philippines.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The point I am trying to get at is, the total amount appropriated to be used in the Philippine Islands is $600,000?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No, sir.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much is the total?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The total to be used for batteries in the two sets of islands is $600,000. Two hundred thousand dollars is appropriated for guns in the insular possessions. That may be used there, or may be used at Guam, or may be used at Guantanamo, or may be used in any of the insular possessions of the United States. One hundred thousand dollars is appropriated for ammunition in the same way, and that may be used in any of the insular possessions of the United States.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am obliged to the gentleman for that information. The gentleman stated a moment ago that every cent that the War Department had called for to be used in Hawaii had been appropriated in this bill. Has every cent that the War Department has called for in the Philippine Islands been appropriated in this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I would say not, in this sense——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the difference between the two?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, very great.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much did the War Department call for?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, the War Department's call was very great for the Philippines. It had various estimates, from $3,000,000 down to $700,000, for the fortifications in the insular possessions. For the batteries they got $600,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What was the $3,000,000 to cover and what was it asked for?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Three million dollars was not specifically asked for, but in the showing of the distribution they would make of that much money, if they had it, it was stated that it would cover Manila, Subig Bay, Guantanamo——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. For what purpose were they to use the money at these places?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Fortifying.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then all the way from $3,000,000 they wanted, if they could get it for this purpose, and you have reduced it to $600,000 between those two islands?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. For batteries.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The $3,000,000 was not asked for the Philippine Islands, but for all the insular possessions?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, it was not asked, but the statement was made as to how the $3,000,000 would be apportioned if they got it.

Mr. KAHN. In all the insular possessions.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I asked the gentleman from Iowa how much the War Department requested for the Philippine Islands. That was my inquiry, and the gentleman said $3,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, no; not at all. The War Department did not make a request for the Philippine Islands separate and distinct from the other insular possessions, except as to seacoast batteries, you understand. There has been no separation whatever in the estimate or in the appropriation for guns.

There has been no separation in the appropriation for ammunition. The only separation at all is in the appropriation for seacoast batteries. For that purpose this year the request of the Department was for $1,000,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. For what?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. For seacoast batteries.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Was there any more? The gentleman alluded to an item of $3,000,000 here. Why did they use that term "three million?"

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Because the War Department in these items does not request that we give them all that is necessary to complete their work, but they ask of us such an allowance as they think can be utilized until another appropriation bill is passed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. In other words, they contemplate that it will take $3,000,000 to equip the islands?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, it will take more than that. The gentleman from Tennessee constantly confuses seacoast batteries with the completion of fortifications.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am trying to get at how much it will cost to complete the equipment.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will state that the fortifications at Manila Bay will probably cost $2,000,000. The fortifications at Subig Bay would cost over $1,000,000. The fortifications at Guantanamo will probably cost $2,000,000 or $2,500,000 to complete them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman; that is what I wanted.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. I understood the gentleman to say that the Appropriation Committee did not have time to investigate what money has been spent for in the past, and all they can do is to confine themselves to ascertaining what is to be done with the money to be spent in the future.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Begging the gentleman's pardon, I did not say that.

Mr. PALMER. That was the inference I drew from the remarks that the gentleman made. I think he further stated that if the ten committees on expenditure in the different Departments did their duty they would furnish a great deal of useful information to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If the gentleman will pardon me, I did not say that either.

Mr. PALMER. I understood him to say that those committees didn't do anything at all, and I wanted to ask him, if they were charged with certain business, why they didn't do it?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I did not say that, Mr. Chairman, and with those few errors the gentleman is correct. [Laughter.]

Mr. PALMER. Didn't the gentleman make some remarks on that subject?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I did.

Mr. PALMER. I would like to understand what the gentleman did say.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I said that the appropriating committees were primarily charged with the investigation of what was needed for the future; that investigation as to what had been done with the money previously received was, of course, an aid in determining what should be appropriated for the future, but that was not the primary duty of the appropriating committees, and that it was impracticable for the four committees of this House to discharge their primary duties as to what ought to be appropriated for the future and to examine in detail every expenditure of the $640,000,000.

Mr. PALMER. That is exactly what I understood the gentleman to say.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. But that is not what the gentleman said that I said.

Mr. PALMER. And I wanted to know, if these committees did not perform their functions, why they existed, and who it is that has put them out of business.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I said that the rule did not require the committees to make an independent investigation of the expenditures and render a report to the House. It says "proposed legislation" on the subjects within their jurisdiction shall be referred to them. I think the rule ought to say that it shall be the duty of the committees to make an annual investigation of the expenditure of these Departments and report to this House. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I hold in my hand a report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1905, and on page 9 and other pages it shows that there has been an expenditure by the United States Government of seven hundred and twenty millions, giving for each Department of the Government, and including all of the ten Departments to which the gentleman has referred, a statement of the expenditures made during the past year for various purposes.

I think the remarks which the gentleman has made about these ten committees seem to cast some aspersion upon them if it should go to the country that these Departments had made the expenditures and that there was no examination of the way in which they had been made. If that impression is to go abroad I think he has made an unjust criticism upon the faithful service of seventy Members of this House, upon these ten committees, of having neglected their duty.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman is mistaken. I stated that the rule did not require these committees to make independent investigations. Can that cast any aspersion upon them?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will not the gentleman supplement that statement with the fact that every one of these expenditures have been properly audited in the various Departments, that each Department has reported to Congress in a separate document in detail showing the object for which every penny has been expended, and that it has all passed through a complete system of auditing, showing whether the expenditures have been in accordance with the law and in line with the appropriations made the preceding year by his own committee?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman claim that from the statement as made up he knew it was the invariable practice to buy portraits of all Cabinet officers and superior bureau officers?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I knew it was the practice without the statement at all.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Did the gentleman know it from the statements?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I did not.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Do the statements show it?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. It has not been my duty to look into it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Do the statements show it?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I don't know whether they do or not. I know this, Mr. Chairman, that that expenditure could not have been made without having been audited by the Auditor of the Treasury Department for the Attorney-General's Office.

Mr. McNARY and Mr. ALEXANDER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McNARY].

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. But, Mr. Chairman, I have not yet concluded. I am utterly unable to understand how any penny of the funds of this Government which will be appropriated by this committee—the chairman of the subcommittee of which is now addressing the House—can be expended by any Department of the Government and that Congress should not know by official reports that those expenditures have been properly made and approved by the Auditor of the respective Departments in the Treasury Department.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Before yielding to the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I did not mean to be understood as claiming that these accounts were not properly audited within the respective Departments. I did not mean to assert they were not reported to Congress. I did not say so, but I am not one of those who believe in allowing this to drift into a bureaucratic government. [Applause.] I want some examination of the expenditures of public money made by somebody besides the Auditor of that particular Department. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Why does not the gentleman come in with a recommendation instead of simply a criticism?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have made a recommendation that these great committees of this House be vitalized by amendment to the rules of this House which will make them, in place of subordinate committees, among the very great committees of the House of Representatives of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. To clear up this matter to my mind, I understood the gentleman to say—and if I am wrong I hope he will correct me—that his Committee on Appropriations did not make an examination into the expenditures of the Government, and I understood him further to say that the other committees on expenditures in the different Departments did not make an examination into the expenditures of those Departments.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I did not so state, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McNARY. But, therefore, if I understood him correctly, as far as the gentleman has stated there is no committee of this House which makes an examination into the expenditures of the Departments, and the only information we have as to whether those expenditures are actually so or not is the report of some auditor in some one of the Departments; that, as a matter of fact, this House takes the statement of the auditor of the Department and does not make an independent investigation itself, and there is no knowledge on the part of the gentleman's committee or any other committees as to whether or not those expenditures were made. If that is the case, I would like to know it. If it is not, I would like to have it cleared up.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have stated that I did not say so. I said it was impossible for these great appropriating committees, charged with the primary duty of ascertaining what was needed for the future, to adequately and sufficiently investigate past expenditures, and I said that no committee investigated the expenditures under so-called "permanent appropriations." That is what I said.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, allow me to ask one question. Is there any such investigation made outside of the permanent appropriations?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. There is to the extent of the ability of these great appropriating committees.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Did the gentleman ever know of a report since his service in Congress from any one of these ten committees on expenditures?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I never did.

Mr. McNARY. And there is no report made, no investigation made, by a committee of this House. There can not be any other deduction.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be some misunderstanding in regard to auditing the accounts of the Government. After a Department passes upon the accounts of its officials they go to the proper auditor of the Treasury Department, an independent quasi-judge, who is entirely independent of the Department first passing upon them, as independent, in fact, as if they were before the Supreme Court of the United States or the Court of Claims.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. That is, they have two audits.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Do you say the Congress of the United States ought to appropriate some six, seven, or eight hundred million dollars a year and make no effort by itself to find out whether the money is properly expended, but trust it wholly to department officials?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; decidedly no.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is all I am contending for.

Mr. ALEXANDER. There seemed to be a misunderstanding on the part of some gentlemen that there was not an independent audit.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The Treasury Department must audit all Departments before paying them, in a sense.

Mr. ALEXANDER. But here is the trouble: The Department of Justice, if you please, is given half a million to expend for United States marshals——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining of the hour.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It passes upon their accounts primarily to its satisfaction. If it thinks a charge is wrong, it sends it back to the marshal to be corrected. When it has thus put the accounts in such shape as it can approve, it sends them to an auditor of the Treasury Department for an independent audit. I do not know how such accounts can be audited more thoroughly than is done by the different auditing officers of the Treasury Department. It is the old Hamilton system, which is in life to-day as much as it was in 1789. The Treasury Department has grown as a tree grows. Hamilton gave it origin and life, and it has grown up and kept pace with the country. It is not a mosaic; it is one great whole; and I do not believe any government under the sun has a better system.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to suggest, if the gentleman from Iowa will yield, notwithstanding this perfect system of auditing he speaks of, we do ascertain upon investigation that many appropriations are diverted from the purpose for which Congress intended.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Is that the fault of the auditors?

Mr. TAWNEY. Not necessarily——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I must decline to yield further.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Let me answer the chairman's question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I can not accept the chairman's statement that the auditors of the Treasury Department allow money to be diverted from channels along which the law intended it should go. I have never heard of an instance of it.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will read the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations taken yesterday I think he will be convinced that my statement is correct.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I want to add, however, that I see no reason why the Congress should not make its own investigation. I favor the fullest investigation.

Mr. TAWNEY. We are now making the fullest investigation possible with the time at our command.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I wish to ask two questions, solely for information. Have they ever fixed Pearl Harbor so they can get a battle ship into it?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am not advised as to the condition of Pearl Harbor, but I will say to the gentleman that the fortifications of Honolulu and Pearl Harbor will be identical, the same fortifications protecting both, and the city of Honolulu ought to be fortified anyhow.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If they have not done it, why have they not done it?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Simply because the Navy Department has not reached that stage of progress in the construction of its navy-yards.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It was stated over and over again here in debate at the time of annexation of the Sandwich Islands, that if we did not get Pearl Harbor and have it fixed the whole Republic would likely be bombarded. I want to know if they are going to do it?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The fortifications are necessary, because the same fortifications cover Honolulu and Pearl Harbor.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am interested in the harbor being fixed so that we can get a battle ship in it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell us how far he thinks his committee has the power to investigate these matters, and how far it has gone?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Our committee would be authorized, if it saw fit, to investigate everything that has been done under the last year's appropriation. We went into the most exhaustive hearings on this bill, the most exhaustive in many years, but we could not take time enough to ascertain what is needed for the future and investigate every item of expenditure under all the headings in the past.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I would like to know from the gentleman if he does not think that these committees on expenditures in the various Departments should meet and investigate the expenditures in these various Departments?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have been endeavoring, in my humble way, to present that proposition to this committee—that they ought to be required to investigate the respective Departments and annually report to this House as to all abuses in them.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I will be very glad if the gentleman will introduce a resolution of that kind. We will support him on this side of the Chamber, I know.

Mr. CASSEL. Coming back to the bill. Under "Fortifications in insular possessions" you say, "For construction of seacoast batteries in the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands, $600,000." Would the whole of this $600,000 be spent in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It could be; yes, sir.

Mr. CASSEL. The law that was passed in 1895 said, "Hereafter all estimates for fortifications for insular possessions of the United States shall be made and submitted to Congress showing amounts proposed to be expended at each harbor and in each insular possession."

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That has been done.

Mr. CASSEL. Now, what is the amount in that suggested appropriation?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The estimate for this work is not given separately on the copy I have before me.

Mr. CASSEL. May I tell the gentleman, then? The War Department asks for $740,000 for the Philippine Islands and $260,000 for the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is correct.

Mr. CASSEL. Now, then, why has not a specific appropriation been made for each of these different works, according to the request of the War Department, instead of putting it in bulk?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The War Department did not so request. The War Department complied with the act of Congress which required them in the insular possessions to furnish detailed estimates.

Mr. CASSEL. Was it not the intention in that act that the appropriation should be made specifically, as well as the request for appropriations?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think not. I helped to draw that provision, and I did not so understand it.

Mr. CASSEL. Would it not have been a better thing?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think not.

Mr. CASSEL. And clear up this matter so Congress could make a direct appropriation for the different islands?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think it would be a great mistake to advise all the people of the world just how much we are spending in Honolulu, just how much we are spending in Manila, and at Subig Bay. It is contrary to the practice of all the nations of the earth.

Mr. CASSEL. Then a general appropriation had better be made for the whole proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That has been the practice from the beginning of our fortification system.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] has consumed one hour.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to use any portion of the time in my control now, and I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. This bill carries appropriations amounting to $4,838,993. At the last session of Congress there was appropriated for fortifications $6,747,893, or $1,908,900 more than the present bill carries. The scheme of seacoast fortifications, for which appropriations are made, is that adopted by the so-called "Endicott board." Since 1888 Congress has been providing the means to perfect the plans of defense then adopted. It has been estimated that the complete cost of fortifications planned by the Endicott board will be $99,392,222. The total appropriation for fortifications since 1888 has been $119,102,483.32, of which $62,094,042.24 have been expended upon the Endicott scheme.

The balance of the appropriations, about half of the entire amount appropriated during the past eighteen years, has been used in the erection and equipment of the gun factory at Watervliet, the gun-carriage factory at Watertown, for work of the Board of Ordnance and Fortifications, in the purchase of land for fortification sites, in acquiring torpedoes for harbor defense, for ammunition for service and test, in the manufacture of field guns, and to a limited extent in providing fortifications for the insular possessions.

The war with Spain accounts for the fact that during the Fifty-fifth Congress the total appropriations made for purposes of fortifications aggregated the sum of $35,828,134.60. With the exception of that Congress, when war made imperative lavish expenditures for the national defense, the policy has always been to proceed gradually with the work of completing the seacoast fortifications.

For the fiscal year 1905 the total estimates submitted to Congress for fortifications amounted to $21,573,197, while the appropriations were $7,518,192. For the fiscal year 1906 the estimates were $10,458,570.40; the appropriations, $6,747,893. For the coming fiscal year of 1907 the total estimates are $10,288,066.65, while the amount proposed to be allowed in the pending bill is $4,838,993. That it has been wise to proceed slowly with this work has been demonstrated beyond question. Improvements extremely important in character are continuously being made in guns, ammunition, projectiles, gun carriages, methods of firing and supplying guns, in the methods of directing and controlling gun fire, and in innumerable other matters that have resulted in some respects in a complete revolution in the methods in use when the Endicott board made its report.

So marked have been some of the changes brought about by the remarkable inventive genius of our people and the skill and scientific attainments of officers assigned to the work pertaining to the development of what may be termed the "matériel" of our fortifications that it became imperative within the recent past to appoint a board to revise the plans of the Endicott board. So it happened that the present Secretary of War, Mr. Taft, appointed a board known as the "Taft board," consisting of Army and Navy officials, constituted along identical lines with that of the Endicott board, to revise the plans originally adopted for the country's defense. The result undoubtedly will be greater efficiency in the protection of the ports of the country, and the cost will be correspondingly increased.

So far as the provision is made in the pending bill for fortifications, ammunition, and other necessary works and apparatus for this country, there was practically unanimity among the members of the committee. There were, of course, differences of opinion, but those differences were easily reconcilable. While some of the members of the committee might have changed the amounts allotted in different items, if their own views could have been adopted, upon the whole the bill as finally agreed upon was satisfactory to the entire committee.

The same unanimity, however, Mr. Chairman, does not exist as to the provision for the fortifications of the insular possessions; and it is to this point particularly that I wish to direct what I have to say. From 1888 to 1906, eighteen fiscal years, with the exception of the extraordinary amount allotted during the Fifty-fifth Congress, the total appropriations for fortifications were $97,561,744.72, an average of $5,420,096.93 a year. The pending bill is about 10 per cent lower than the average of appropriation bills during the past eighteen years, and of the $4,858,993 carried in this bill $1,087,000, or about 25 per cent of the total, is allotted for fortifications in the insular possessions.

The items allowed for these possessions in the bill are as follows:

For seacoast batteries, $600,000; for procurement of sites in Hawaiian Islands, $150,000; for seacoast guns, carriages, etc., $200,000; ammunition for seacoast guns, etc., $100,000; alteration and maintenance of seacoast artillery in insular possessions, $5,000; inspecting instruments, range finders, etc., $32,000.

In addition to the amounts appropriated, an item in the bill permits the mounting of seven 12-inch guns in the insular possessions, out of the guns now on hand in the Department of War as a reserve for this country. So that, in addition to the amounts actually appropriated, the cost of these guns should be included in the total amount allotted for the insular possessions.

A different spirit seems to animate men whenever it is proposed to appropriate for the Philippine Islands. There has never been any doubt of the advisability of proceeding slowly and gradually in the work of completing the defenses for the United States; but there seems to be an extraordinary haste upon the part of everybody who has anything to do with the matter to obtain appropriations, asked or suggested, for the Philippine Islands. If there be any possibility within the near future of a war with a foreign country, then the total amount carried in this bill is ridiculously small and absurd. If there be no danger of a foreign war, then, in my judgment, the amount allotted in this bill for the insular possessions, about 25 per cent of the entire appropriation, is outrageously extravagant.

In the last Congress great dissatisfaction was manifested with the manner in which money was being appropriated and expended for defenses in the insular possessions. It must be remembered that while it has never been specifically stated in the fortification appropriation bills, during the past eighteen years, where the money appropriated should be expended, nevertheless a well-defined and positive scheme of fortifications had been adopted for the different harbors and ports of this country. While Congress appropriated money in gross sums, it was known that the War Department would utilize the money at the places where it was most imperatively needed, but under the well-defined plan that had been approved by Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit me an inquiry? Is it not known to the gentleman, at least unofficially, that the Taft board has prepared the same kind of a plan of fortification covering the Philippines and Hawaii as the Endicott board prepared covering the continental United States?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not that information. I applied to the Office of Naval Intelligence in the Navy Department, which I assumed might have some information about the proposed scheme for the defense of the Philippine Islands, and I was informed Saturday that they had no information on the subject there. It was further stated that my request for information had been referred to the office of the Secretary of the Navy, and so far the only information sent has been a copy of the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, to which I shall refer later. From other sources I obtained information which led me to conclude that the report of the Taft board was not ready to transmit to Congress, but would be shortly. I am not aware that the board has done anything other than revise the original Endicott board's plans. However that may be, no Member of Congress has ever critically examined the Taft board's plan for the fortifications of the Philippine Islands.

Congress did approve tacitly, if not specifically, the plan of defense for this country originally adopted by the Endicott board, so that while appropriations were made of lump sums for fortification purposes, it was with the knowledge on the part of Congress that the money would be expended to carry out a well-considered and approved plan.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. In regard to the suggestion made by the chairman of the committee, does not the gentleman know that there has been and is now considerable conflict between different branches of the service as to whether Cavite or Subig Bay shall be made the specially fortified harbor of the Philippine Islands? And is it not true that there is not only not a definite plan, but that there is a very great divergence of opinion as to what plan shall be followed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. From several unofficial sources I have obtained information that inclines me to the belief that there is considerable divergence of opinion, but unfortunately I have been confronted with the fact that the General Board states in such positive terms that it has decided upon at least two projects for fortifications in the Philippine Islands, that until I know what is in the report of the Taft board I should be inclined to hesitate to say whether there is an official difference of opinion, whatever private difference of opinion there may be among the officers.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will pardon me a second interruption, is it not a fact that the War Department has two purposes in fortifications: One to fortify harbors and protect cities and avoid landings, and the other to protect naval stations; and that, so far as Manila is concerned, the War Department would act, largely, independently on its own judgment for the protection of the city and the harbor, and whereas at Subig Bay it would absolutely follow the Navy as to whether the Navy put a navy-yard there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. At this time I will make a statement that I intended to make later. This army and navy board has decided that one of the most effective defenses for the city of Manila would be a strongly fortified place at Subig Bay, with a powerful fleet inside of it.

The joint army and naval board has made this statement in a recommendation that with Subig Bay strongly fortified—and Subig Bay is only from 40 to 70 miles from Manila—and with a strong fleet within Subig Bay a hostile fleet would hesitate very much to enter Manila under those circumstances. But why it would not be more effective to put the fleet in Manila and have fortifications at the entrance of Manila Bay to prevent the hostile fleet entering is something I am unable to understand. I am only a layman; I have not the scientific knowledge necessary to pass upon such question; but why a fleet and fortifications 40 miles away would be more effective than if they were right at hand is beyond my comprehension.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. DRISCOLL. May not this be the reason that, since we are not permanently located in the Philippines and may withdraw some time and set up a republic there, if we spent fifty millions in Subig Bay, we might retain it as a permanent naval station? Now, I want to ask the gentleman a question. This bill provides $600,000 for seacoast protection in the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands. I want to ask if there is anything in this appropriation bill or in the disposition of it by the War Department or the Navy Department or any other Department by which a site may be purchased, or in any way commit the Government to one place in preference to another as a permanent station?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The difficulty about this appropriation is that if it be made in the way proposed in this bill some official in a bureau, or one of the Cabinet officials, by directing that the money be expended at a certain place, could to that extent commit the country to a policy without any decision of the question by Congress.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KEIFER. Wasn't that the custom at all times, to leave to the Department the distribution of the fund and the selection of the place where the money would be expended?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have explained that that was done in this country, but it was because Congress had approved of the Endicott plan. Lump sums were appropriated, and it was left to the discretion of the Department to say where the money was most imperatively required. But Congress knew that it would be expended in accordance with the plan which it had approved. There has been, however, no plan adopted so far as the insular possessions are concerned. Last year the dissatisfaction became so great that this provision was enacted in the fortifications act:

Hereafter all estimates for fortifications of insular possessions of the United States shall be made and submitted to Congress, showing the amount proposed to be expended at each harbor in each insular possession.

The Department complied with that law, and in the original draft of the bill submitted to the committee for consideration there was contained the items for each particular harbor for which appropriations are desired at this time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman tell the committee what reason the Committee on Appropriations had for appropriating a lump sum instead of specifying where the money was to be expended?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am about to discuss that. As I said, in the draft of the bill submitted to the Committee on Appropriations the harbors were specifically named and the amount for each place definitely stated. There seems to be a very prevalent belief that some particular advantage will be gained by some foreign power if, instead of saying $600,000 shall be appropriated for the Hawaiian Islands and the Philippine Islands, a definite amount should be fixed for the Hawaiian Islands and for each place in the Philippine Islands sought to be fortified. It is well known that there is only one fortification for the Hawaiian Islands—that is, one project that will effectively cover both Honolulu and Pearl Harbor..

It is immaterial how much is expended at those places; the thing that is of value to a foreign power is to know the exact location of the different guns that are mounted for defense. It is immaterial whether one million or ten millions of dollars are expended. That information is contained in the estimates submitted to Congress, and there is no doubt that the information is transmitted to every foreign capital in the world, perhaps more quickly than it reaches the Members of the House in their investigations. That information is not of much value. The thing to be kept secret, and which is important, is just at what particular place the particular guns are to be mounted. The whole system of modern defense is based upon concealed fire, so as to prevent hostile fleets concentrating their fire upon the places where the guns are mounted and so dismantling them.

Unable to apprehend any disadvantage from such a policy, I am in favor at this time of specifically restricting the appropriations for fortifications in the insular possessions to particular harbors. There has never been, to my knowledge, and I have endeavored to get the information, what might be said to be a definite plan for the complete defense, protection, and fortifications of the Philippine Islands. It is true that the general board has stated that it is necessary to defend Manila and also Subig Bay.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would ask the gentleman what he would defend at Subig Bay?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, they say there is nothing there at present but vacant land, but the Navy Department intends to put there a very elaborate naval station, and when that is there the defenses will be needed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What is there now?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The information conveyed to the committee is practically that the land is vacant.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is there any land there at all? Is it not a fact that to-day there is not a place big enough that is available to put an ordinary warehouse on, and that the full plan—if there is a plan—is to hereafter redeem or capture from the sea by piling or some system of that kind a place large enough to put some buildings upon it, and digging the hill away in the rear?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is a considerable plan, to which I am going to refer in a moment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And when the gentleman gets to that, I wish him to state another thing. Where is the fortification that is to protect the naval station to be put? The gentleman speaks about getting the navy in behind the fortifications. Where are the fortifications to be?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, we always leave the exact location of fortifications to the men who have been educated to determine questions similar to that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. As a matter of fact, if the gentleman will allow me, there is an open harbor narrower at the mouth than in the rear, in the basin part of it, but whatever fortifications are made have to be put somewhere outside of Subig Bay, and if this House could only go, as some Members of it did, and look into Subig Bay, and much more fully than any naval officer ever did, the Members would understand how utterly absurd this whole proposition is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think it is necessary for any man of ordinary intelligence to go to Subig Bay to form an opinion on the subject.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Although I know that to go there and see what anybody can infer from the information at hand is to make a man's convictions very positive.

Mr. GROSVENOR That is right.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But my statement will be based entirely on what I have been able to obtain from official reports.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, allow me to ask the gentleman a question right there in view of what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] says. If it is as unreasonable to fix this harbor for defense at Subig Bay as the gentleman from Ohio thinks it is, is it not unwise still to leave it in the discretion of the Navy Department and the War Department to do that very thing?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why not fix it so that they can not do it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope enough gentlemen in this committee will agree with me to put an amendment on the bill to make it absolutely impossible to expend a dollar of this money at Subig Bay.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope so, too, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me. And for this very simple reason: If we ever get anything of value out of the Philippine acquisitions, and I believe we will of immense value, the center of it will be at Manila, and if we ever have a war grow out of our possessions over there——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Which we will have.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The center of that war will be at Manila. Now, then, I am not strategist enough to combat the opinion of the Admiral of the Navy, but left to my common sense I would say that with a narrow harbor and a narrow entrance 14 or 16 miles from Manila, capable of protection and defense and fortification that can make it strong as Gibraltar, that is where we should expend our money. I speak now of Corregidor, the island situated in the mouth of the harbor, with narrow channels on each side of it, with bluff shores on each side of it, in a position that could defy all the navies of the world at one time. That is the place to fortify against the entrance of a hostile navy into Manila Bay, and if you do not do that, while you are signaling your fleet to come down 55 or 60 miles from Subig Bay the enemy will have gone inside and destroyed the naval station at Cavite and destroyed the city if they saw fit to do so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. While the naval authorities say if Subig Bay was fortified and a fleet was in there it would make it unlikely a hostile fleet would go to Manila, yet I agree with the gentleman from Ohio that if the fortifications were at Manila and our fleet was behind them it would be much more unlikely that a hostile fleet could enter.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it not a fact that what it is contemplated to make in the way of improvement or fortification at Subig Bay has in view the abandonment at some time in the future of the Philippine Islands, and that if we should expend money for fortifications of Cavite or Manila Bay that when we abandon the Philippine Islands the money expended there would be of no service whatever to the people of this country; but, on the other hand, if we did fortify Subig Bay it would be with the intention of retaining it, when we abandon the Philippine Islands, as a permanent feature of this Government, such as a coaling station or whatever we may want to have there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I do not know that I can answer that. All that I know is that on December, 1903, the joint board in a communication marked "Confidential" and printed as a House document—so that there is no great secrecy about this information—makes this statement, which I will put in the RECORD and then it can be examined by all Members for themselves. I will read it all so as to make it complete:

CONFIDENTIAL.] JOINT BOARD,
Washington, December 19, 1903.

SIR: The joint board having been requested by the Secretary of the Navy to consider how far the available resources of the two services, in advance of Congressional action, will suffice to protect certain naval advanced bases in our insular possessions, and having made its report on that subject, regards it a duty to submit more particularly to the Departments of War and of the Navy its opinion on the need of an immediate appropriation by Congress for the fortification of Subig Bay and Manila Bay.

The policy of Congress may be assumed to be to hold the Philippines in American possession as against any foreign enemy, but although the islands have been in our possession now more than five years, not a gun has been mounted nor an earthwork raised to protect any of their harbors. The defense of the Philippines in war depends upon the cooperation of the Army and the Navy. Both are united in demanding the fortification of Subig Bay as essential to any plan of defense. This joint board, representing the professional opinion of both services, has the honor to submit to the Government its judgment that the national policy as expressed in Congress can not be maintained in war unless provision is made for defense.

The Secretary of the Navy, in his annual report, has given the reasons in favor of establishing the principal naval station of the Philippines in Subig Bay. In his words, "It would seem as if this body of opinion ought to be deemed conclusive. I know of no other military question upon which such unanimity exists." The decision of the Government, then, needing only the appropriation by Congress to give it effect to establish a naval base in Subig Bay, may be regarded as fixed.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield one moment at that point to a question as to the unanimity of opinion?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will allow me to complete this statement, and then I shall yield to him.

The Navy Department has already in view the deposit of a large store of coal at Olongapo, the site chosen for the naval station in Subig Bay, and the floating dry dock authorized by Congress, at a cost, including transportation, of about a million and a quarter dollars, is destined for the same place. Obviously such resources, unprotected by fortifications, would be at the mercy of the enemy or—only less disastrous consequence—would enforce the presence of the fleet to defend them, thereby hindering instead of promoting its activity.

The joint board is unanimously of the opinion—

(1) That without a fortified naval base in the Philippines the Asiatic fleet can not keep open the lines of communication for supplies from the United States, or between the Army posts within the Philippines, without which supplies the military forces of the United States could not hold command of the islands.

(2) That Manila is not, but that Subig Bay is, suited for a naval base and station, and of all harbors in the archipelago it is the best for the purpose.

(3) That the fortification of Subig Bay is essential to the security of a naval station located there.

(4) That a fortified naval base at Subig Bay will contribute materially to the defense of Manila Bay.

These four are the opinions the board are unanimous upon. I will read the rest of this extract, because it is interesting:

The Secretary of War, in his annual report, calls attention to "the necessity of constructing defenses for our insular possessions," and names Subig Bay and Manila Bay among other places for which "projects for defense * * * have been made and approved, and estimates for the necessary construction have been transmitted to Congress," and adds:

"There ought to be no delay in putting all of these points in such a condition that at least they will not be defenseless against any sudden foray by a single lightly armed cruiser."

The purpose of the Joint Board is to point out that Subig, the American naval base in the Far East, and Manila, the capital and military headquarters of the Philippines, stand preeminent, and to urge that appropriation for the fortification of the two bays should be made by Congress without delay, in order that the development of the naval station and its defense may proceed together and that the commercial and military resources of the city may be guarded. The consequences of neglect or delay may be nothing less than national disaster.

That is signed by George Dewey, Admiral of the Navy, senior member. Now I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understood the gentleman in reading that report to state that there was an absolute unanimity of sentiment between the military and naval authorities on the Subig Bay question. Is it not a fact General Wood is wholly and absolutely opposed to the creation of a naval station at Subig Bay?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have heard from different Members of the House that there is a serious doubt in the minds of many very eminent Army and Navy officials as to the advisability of fortifying Subig Bay; and yet the official information communicated to Congress is to the effect that there is no military question affecting this country upon which there is so universal unanimity among officials as upon this question.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will permit another interruption; I believe it is a fact that General Corbin has also changed his mind absolutely as to the availability of Subig Bay, and he is now opposed to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, if those two officials have all of the influence with this Administration that it is intimated they have, this plan to fortify Subig Bay may be relegated to oblivion.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow a single further observation? Does the gentleman know anything of the country in the rear or back of Subig Bay?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am going to read something——

Mr. GROSVENOR. And of the character of productions and supplies, or anything of that kind, or the travel necessary to get to Manila or anywhere else from the region where Subig Bay is located?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will read from a statement made by the Secretary of the Navy in 1904 (Mr. Moody) as to the advisability and necessity of establishing a naval station at Subig Bay.

On the 25th of January, 1904, he said to the Naval Committee:

In regard to Guantanamo and Olongapo, I want to say in the beginning that no words of mine can overestimate the national importance of these two stations. I think I would rather see every appropriation for public works in the bill cut out than fail on these two stations. Let me take up Olongapo—

first.

We have been five years in the Philippines. We have not any naval station there of any consequence. We have no dock, we have no repair shops or storehouses under the protection of fortifications, and if there should be a foreign war, as I am advised, and I do not see why the advice is not sound, we should be perfectly helpless in the East. If we continue to stay in the Philippines it is of vital importance we should establish a naval station there. Now, where? Every single bit of information is in favor of establishing it within Subig Bay, at the harbor of Olongapo. Nobody disagrees. The Army and Navy alike say it is the place to do it. There is plenty of water. The protection of the entrance may be made perfect.

At the same time the Secretary of the Navy submitted to the Naval Committee a detailed estimate of the cost of providing a naval station at Olongapo. He submitted the figures given by what was known as the "Olongapo board," and he gave the figures as revised by the Department.

The figures given by the Olongapo board stated that the cost of a complete naval station at Olongapo would be $12,907,500. The revised figures in the Department made it $9,784,500, and that excludes $1,125,000 previously estimated for the floating steel dry dock.

Mr. McNARY. How much would it be at Manila?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will come to the naval station at Cavite when I finish this.

Mr. LONGWORTH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman pardon me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has it not also been stated that it will take not less than seven years before this station could be built under any circumstances, even supposing that labor could be gotten there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think that is true. This station has an acreage of 32 square miles of territory. I do not know whether it is under water or up in the mountain. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] states that there is no room there now for a single warehouse.

Mr. McNARY. Is not one of the real reasons for preferring Subig Bay to Manila Bay or Cavite the fact that Subig Bay can be defended at the entrance, and that Manila Bay is about 30 miles wide, and there is not any possibility of defending that, as Dewey well showed when he went in there? And the question of labor can be settled, as it is in these matters, by bringing the labor to the point?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; the defense of Manila is much simpler than that of Subig Bay. The entrance to Manila Bay is narrow, with an island in the center. The trouble with the Spaniards when Dewey went in was that they were asleep, or at least not keenly alert. They did not awaken in time. Our fleet was passing the fortifications before a shot was fired, and quickly slipped by them before the fire was effectively directed.

Mr. RIXEY. I understand that one of the serious objections to Cavite is that the dredging would be very expensive.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will pardon me, I want to take up the dredging at Olongapo first.

Mr. RIXEY. I want to call the gentleman's attention to another objection, and that is that there is not sufficient land at Cavite, and they can not get it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In this estimate of the Olongapo board, afterwards revised by the Navy Department—I hope the gentleman will pay attention to this, because the Secretary of the Navy and everybody else has said there was ample water at Olongapo—there is an estimate for dredging of 6,260,000 cubic yards in the inner basin, to cost $1,900,000; the revised estimate cuts it to 3,000,000 cubic yards to be dredged, at a cost of $600,000. Then 1,934,000 cubic yards is to be dredged at Maritan Point—that was reduced in the revision to 1,100,000 cubic yards, and the difference in price was from $800,000 to $220,000; cutting down the Lalake Hill—and this is what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] refers to—765,000 cubic yards of material, at a cost of $498,000.

Closing the branches of the Santa Rita and Binictigan rivers, $45,000. The station is said to contain 32,000 square miles and has 16 miles of water front. It is necessary to remove a mountain, to do about $3,300,000 worth of dredging, to close, or turn off, at least two rivers in order to make the place available as a naval station. And yet a naval and army board have submitted a unanimous report to Congress that this is the most ideal place in the Philippine Islands for a naval station. So far as I am concerned, I shall refuse to accept as conclusive as to the desirability of this place as a naval station the opinion of a board that admits a mountain must be leveled, that 4,100,000 cubic yards of dredging must be done, and two rivers turned from their courses in order to make the reservation available. That can not possibly be, in my judgment, the most desirable place for a naval station in the Philippine Islands.

They tell us that the naval station at Cavite, in Manila Harbor, will be abandoned. Secretary Moody stated in the hearing in 1904 that it was not the intention of the Department to establish a great naval establishment in the Philippine Islands like that at New York or League Island; but a place was wanted where ordinary repair work could be done. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that such a station now exists. Considerable money has been expended to obtain it. It appears from the latest report of the Chief of Bureau of Construction and Repair that in his department alone during the last fiscal year at the Cavite Navy-Yard the maximum number of workmen employed was 1,217, the minimum 781, the average 1,076. Besides the Bureau of Construction and Repair, there is Steam Engineering, Equipment, and Yards and Docks.

The amount of work done at this particular station is somewhat surprising, in view of the repeated statements that it is unsuited for naval repairs. In a communication sent by the Navy Department, in January, 1906, to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, there is contained detailed information as to the amount of money expended for the repair of ships at every navy-yard of the United States, and the naval station at Cavite ranks fifth among the number. For instance, at the greatest naval establishment of the country, in Brooklyn, there was expended $1,545,718; at Norfolk, Va., $791,923; at Boston, $786,639.21; at Mare Island, Cal., $664,803.81; at Cavite, $556,861.15. Not by one Bureau alone was this money expended. Equipment spent $22,807.67; Ordnance, $12,704.17; Construction and Repair, $303,328.41; Steam Engineering, $218,020.90. With the exception of the amount of work done in the navy-yard at Brooklyn, the work done at Cavite is practically as great as that done at any other great naval station of the United States. So that I say there is to-day, with a very little additional expenditure, ample facilities for the ordinary repair work of the Navy in the Philippine Islands. And yet it is planned to abandon and dismantle this station and create another, entailing expenditures of from $12,000,000 to, perhaps, $25,000,000.

The estimates submitted for this year for a naval station at Olongapo, aggregate $1,000,000; and I shall read what the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks says about these estimates:

> Naval station, Olongapo, Philippine Islands, estimates aggregating $1,000,000. Estimate submitted for improvement of this station are those recommended by the board of officers appointed to specifically consider the immediate requirements of this station on a working basis. The Bureau has had no opportunity to learn anything more about these items than is disclosed by the details of amounts estimated; but as the board has made the matter a special study, the Bureau has no doubt the improvements are those most calculated to meet the immediate efficiency of the station and to prepare it for navy operations. The estimates are accordingly formally submitted and commended to favorable consideration.

It is not stated whether it is the so-called Olongapo board's work, which was revised and considerably reduced by the Department, or whether another board has prepared these estimates. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and other gentlemen who were there know what is at Olongapo at present. Let me read what is estimated will be necessary to put this station in a position for immediate operations:

> Temporary installation of tools from Cavite, $80,000; special wharf for floating dry dock, $65,000; toward dredging, filling, grading, including cost of dredges, necessary tools and equipment to cost $1,200,000, $25,000; toward machines, tools, machinery, etc., other than from Cavite, to cost $500,000, $50,000.

Toward quay walls for permanent water front, to cost $840,000, $80,000; extension of drainage canal, $25,000; closing Santa Rita and other rivers, $60,000; toward roads, including bridges, to cost $156,000, $20,000; toward station, railroad, and equipment, to cost $92,000, $20,000; toward ship fitter's shop, to cost $100,000, $75,000; toward bending shop, to cost $110,000, $60,000; sawmills, $65,000; toward smithery, to cost $80,000, $65,000; toward waterworks, to cost $300,000, $60,000; steam floating derrick, $17,000; telephone system, $3,000.

That is the estimate of what is required to put this station where it can commence to do work. The Secretary of the Navy said it is not intended to have anything like the stations that they have in this country. If such a station is established as is evidently contemplated, I know that more work will be done and a more perfect and effective plant will be established in the Philippine Islands than in any place in the United States.

Mr. RIXEY. As the gentleman has stated, the general board of the Army and Navy were unanimous in recommending Olongapo over Manila. Now, in view of that fact, and in view of the further fact that almost without exception, so far as the Naval Committee knows, the naval officers who have visited that coast recommend Subig Bay over Manila Bay, I should like to ask the gentleman what we are to do if we are not to follow these recommendations? Now, I will let the gentleman answer my question first, and then ask him another.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should like to have the gentleman finish, because his question will require more than a categorical answer.

Mr. RIXEY. There are two objections to Cavite. One of them, they say, is practically insurmountable, and that is that the dredging would be exceedingly costly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will state to the gentleman that they show they will have to do $3,000,000 worth of dredging at Olongapo. There is no estimate that it will cost more than that at Cavite.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania rose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I see the gentleman from Pennsylvania shakes his head; but I have the statement submitted by the——

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. The gentleman may have a statement, but it does not follow because he has the statement that Congress proposes to appropriate for $3,000,000 worth of dredging there. If we have a station there, we will maintain it without costing this Government anything for dredging.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania may be able to do that, but considering that after a very careful examination by two boards they submit that it will require about 3,000,000 cubic yards of dredging, the gentleman may be able to explain satisfactorily how he will get rid of that material. For instance, it is absolutely essential that there should be some dredging done at Olongapo in order to make possible the use of the floating dry dock on its way to the Philippines. If no dredging is necessary, how is it that there is pending before the Naval Committee the estimate which I have already mentioned: "Toward dredging, filling, and grading, including cost of dredges and necessary tools and equipment (to cost $1,200,000), $250,000?"

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman give me the time to make an explanation?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has already yielded to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY].

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] can yield time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. RIXEY. The difference between the dredging at Olongapo and Cavite, as claimed by the naval officers, is that when you once dredge Subig Bay it will require very little expenditure to keep it in condition. Whereas at Cavite, Manila Bay, there will be continual dedging of the most costly kind, and it is further stated that it is almost impossible to get sufficient water at Manila Bay.

Another objection to the naval station at Manila Bay is that the Government only has 47 acres of land, both for the Army and the Navy, and the statement of naval officers is that that is not sufficient, and that no additional land can be gotten there.

Those are the objections. So far as I am concerned I feel friendly to the proposition to remain at Cavite, if we can remain there, but if it is an impossibility, then we may as well recognize that condition now as to go on with our expenditures there and recognize it later.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not assume that Cavite is the ideal place for a naval station. I believe that with very little additional expenditure all the imperative repair work required by the Navy in the Far East can be done there. That would obviate the necessity of establishing this costly naval station at Subig Bay, and then the necessity for the fortification of Subig Bay would be obviated.

What has been developed so far regarding the fortifications of Subig Bay? The War Department estimated at first that it would cost $700,000. This year it is stated to the committee that, in view of the plans of the Navy Department, it would cost either a million or a million and a half to fortify the place. There should be some definite plan before Congress is asked to make appropriations. We should not go ahead blindly nor in the dark. Until some policy is adopted by this country as to the future of the Philippine Islands, it does not seem wise to make any expenditure for fortifications at all. As I stated at the outset, Mr. Chairman, if there be danger now or in the near future of a foreign conflict, the $4,800,000 carried in this bill is ridiculously small and absurd; if there be no danger of a conflict between this country and some foreign nation, then the 25 per cent of the amount of this bill to be allotted for insular possessions—$1,087,000—is, in my judgment, outrageously extravagant. Here is what Major Abbot said about the cost of fortifying Subig Bay:

Mr. SMITH. What is to be the total cost of Subig Bay?
Major ABBOT. Subig Bay would have cost about $750,000 under the original project.
Mr. BRUNDIDGE. You say it has cost that?
Major ABBOT. No; it would. That is what it was originally estimated to cost. But in view of the statement by naval authorities as to the importance of the place, it became apparent that the greater number of heavy guns would have to go in, so that the estimates would be probably a million dollars more than we figured on—say, a total of perhaps a million and a half.

As matter of fact there is no man living in this country to-day who is a position to state what the complete cost of fortifying Subig Bay will be. It depends upon too many uncertain and indefinite projects. I am unalterably opposed to spending $30,000,000 for fortifications and a naval station at Subig Bay, regardless of our policy toward the Philippine Islands. There may be some difference of opinion as to the propriety at this time of fortifying Manila. Members on this side of the House are practically unanimous that until a definite declaration of policy is made regarding the Philippine Islands by this Government nothing should be expended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed one hour.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will finish in five minutes. So far as Subig Bay is concerned, I hope the House will effectively put a stop to the contemplated expenditures there. So far nothing has been expended at Subig Bay for fortifications.

Mr. McNARY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. I would like to ask the gentleman to explain how much less it would cost to fortify Manila and complete the work of a naval station there than it will to do the work at Subig Bay.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not all the figures the gentleman requests. I understand it will cost about $3,000,000 to fortify Manila. At Cavite there is a naval station which is practically doing as much work as any naval station in the United States except the navy-yard at Brooklyn. With very little expenditure, in my judgment, that station would suffice for all ordinary repairs. It is different, of course, if it is desired to establish a great plant there, at which could be done anything from ordinary repair to constructing a battle ship.

Even if there be money already expended at Subig Bay, it would be a wise policy, in my judgment, for the country to discontinue expenditures at that place. Whatever expenditures are made let them be at Manila.

When the provision for fortifications in the insular possessions is reached there will be two amendments offered; one will be to strike out the language in the bill which provides for fortifications in the Philippine Islands. If that amendment be not adopted, there will be another amendment to prevent the use of any part of the money appropriated under that item for fortifications at Subig Bay. If that be adopted, the result will be to make $600,000 appropriated for Hawaii and the Philippine Islands available for Honolulu and Pearl Harbor and Manila. I should be pleased to have the House fix specifically the points at which the money shall be expended. Unless this be done, unless some definite policy is determined upon, there can be no estimate of what our expenditures in the Philippines will be. Let something, however trivial, be done at any place, and it will be used as a lever to pry out enough to complete the project irrespective of the total cost.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Can the gentleman give us an estimate of how much money we have already spent in the Philippine Islands for building up the harbors or maintaining the Army or the Navy, or any one of the several expenditures?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not able to tell how much we have expended in connection with the Navy, but in this bill, in the bill passed at the last session of Congress, and in the bill for fortifications in the session that preceded the last, there has been appropriated in all $3,061,920 for objects connected with the fortifications of our insular possessions. Two hundred thousand dollars in addition has been appropriated for sites in Hawaii.

In addition to the money expended we have taken and are authorizing, roughly speaking, about twenty guns to be mounted in the insular possessions. There are transferred from the reserve guns for this country guns for the defense of the insular possessions, and it is impossible, without including the cost of the guns so transferred, accurately to state what it has cost so far to fortify these possessions.

I have purposely avoided saying anything that might be considered as giving a partisan cast to this discussion. That a considerable difference of opinion exists as to the best place to locate a naval base in the Philippine Islands is known to many Members of this House. It is imperative that a sharp watch be kept upon the expenditures by this Government for objects in the Philippines. If the requests that come from the Departments be not carefully scrutinized the appropriations will grow with such surprising rapidity that the country will protest most vehemently. Haste should be made slowly in these matters.

While there are irreconcilable differences between this side of the House and that side upon some questions of policy as affecting the Philippine Islands, there is no difference—indeed, there can be no difference—of opinion as to the necessity and propriety of keeping the appropriations for military purposes in the insular possessions to the lowest possible amount consistent with safety. Two years have passed since the officials of the military departments pronounced so emphatically for the establishment of a naval base at Subig Bay, and yet to-day the dissatisfaction in official circles with this project is growing and becoming more manifest. It is not unpatriotic to call attention to this discontent; it would be highly improper to attempt to conceal it. Let the fullest light be shed upon the entire plan, insist upon the most complete information, consider carefully the opinions of all competent to give judgment, and then our action will be wise and more likely beneficial. Meanwhile enthusiasm should not be used to smother facts, nor should false pride prevent the doing of the wisest thing, regardless of what has been heretofore. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. OLMSTED having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following concurrent resolution; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 10.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President is requested to return to the House of Representatives House bill 297, to authorize the construction of dams and power stations on the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals, Alabama, for the purpose of amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the concurrent resolution which has just come over from the Senate and is on the Speaker's table be concurred in.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OLMSTED). The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President is requested to return to the House of Representatives the bill (H. R. 297) to authorize the construction of dams and power stations on the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals, Alabama, for the purpose of amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, while we are providing for the fortification of our country against a foreign foe I am in favor, also, of fortifying it against an influx of undesirable immigration. Among the most important questions for the consideration of Congress and the people of the United States is the subject of immigration and naturalization of aliens.

For some time past I have been making a study and examination of this important question, with a view, if possible, of arriving at a correct solution of it. In connection with this subject I have carefully examined the last report of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, Hon. Victor H. Metcalf; the last annual report of the Commissioner-General of Immigration, Hon. Frank P. Sargent; the report of the Commission on Naturalization appointed by order of the President March 1, 1905, composed of the following commissioners: Milton D. Purdy, of the Department of Justice; Gaillard Hunt, of the Department of State; Richard K. Campbell, of the Department of Commerce and Labor; also the reports of Immigrant Inspector Marcus Braun, transmitted to the House of Representatives in compliance with a resolution.

All of these reports of these distinguished gentlemen, who have given this subject most full and careful consideration, agree that there should be and must be further restrictions upon the immigration of aliens into the United States and a thorough revision of the laws upon naturalization. In this conclusion, both as to further restriction of immigration and revision of the naturalization laws, I agree.

The subject of immigration of aliens into the United States divides itself naturally under three heads:

First. The admission of aliens into the United States.

Second. The proper distribution of these aliens after they have been admitted in accordance with the law.

Third. The naturalization—making American citizens of such aliens after they have been admitted and distributed.

Upon the subject of admission of aliens into the United States numerous acts of Congress have been passed, and under these acts numerous regulations framed by the Commissioner-General of Immigration. The immigration laws have been, I believe, with possibly a few exceptions, revised and codified in the act of March 3, 1903. In a personal interview with the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor, Mr. Metcalf, and with Mr. Campbell, of the law department of the Bureau of Immigration, I have been informed that practically all the laws upon this subject are contained in the said act of March 3, 1903, and such amendments and additions thereto as in the judgment of the Department of Commerce and Labor are wise and necessary are to be incorporated in a bill to be presented to Congress.

It appears from the report of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that during the past year the number of aliens who applied for admission into the United States was 1,026,499. This is in excess by 237,507 of the number reported for 1882, and the arrivals for that year, 1882, were in excess of those during any year prior to 1903 and more than 200,000 in excess of the arrivals in 1904, so that the year 1905 marked the high tide of immigration into the United States. The following article shows immigration in 1905:

IMMIGRATION IN 1905—NUMBER OF FOREIGNERS ARRIVING ALMOST DOUBLE THE POPULATION OF BOSTON.

[From the New York Sun.]

For purposes of comparison calendar years are as good as fiscal years. The year 1905 breaks the record. The figures for recent years are as follows:

1902	739,289
1903	937,371
1905	1,065,834

The immigration for this single year equals that of the entire fifty years following the inauguration of President Washington. In numbers it doubles the population of Baltimore and nearly doubles the population of such cities as Boston and St. Louis. It would replace the entire population of Connecticut, with 100,000 surplus to spare. It would repopulate Vermont and New Hampshire combined, with 250,000 to spare.

These people came, as usual, from all the corners of the earth, but particularly from the southeastern corner of Europe. The arrivals from Greece, Turkey, Roumania, Servia, and Bulgaria constitute an interesting total of between 25,000 and 30,000. The horde came from Russia, Italy, and Austria-Hungary. The following shows the flood from those countries during the last three years:

Country.	1903.	1904.	1905.
Russia	147,623	161,610	175,831
Austria-Hungary	234,636	165,703	284,967
Italy	233,417	156,764	268,441
Total	615,676	484,167	729,239

Thus it appears that seven-tenths of the arrivals of last year were from these three countries. It also appears that within three years more than 1,800,000 of these people have come to the United States.

The Secretary of Commerce and Labor in his report says:

The important feature is that more than 1,000,000 aliens have been added to our population in the course of twelve months, a fact that suggests the necessity of considering whether some adequate measure should not be adopted so to limit the number of arrivals as to lessen the obvious dangers from our alien population increasing more rapidly than it can be assimilated.

The Commissioner-General of Immigration in his most excellent report of July 1, 1905, containing full information on this important subject, says that—

The welfare of our own people is involved in the continuous influx of such a vast tide of peoples of the most widely varying aims and capacities.

The experience of another year—while it has brought a gratifying confirmation of the confidence heretofore expressed in the efficiency of existing measures and agencies, has also served to establish a strong conviction of the magnitude and gravity of the problem presented by the growth of our alien population. These problems loom so largely in the prospect of our country that it may be said, without giving just cause for the charge of exaggeration, that all other questions of political economy relating to things rather than to human beings shrink into comparative insignificance.

He says—

This is an important question, a great problem worthy of the most careful thought and consideration of every patriotic American citizen. It involves, or may involve, not only the welfare of our people, but our free institutions. An immigration of more than 1,000,000 people in one year is an addition to the population of the United States of about one-eightieth of our present population.

The problem involves questions also from a labor standpoint. We want a desirable class of immigrants in the South and whole country for our farm labor, and we want these immigrants properly distributed; but we do not want the worst and undesirable class of immigrants who enter the country. They compete with American labor and can not be assimilated with our population.

Governor Swanson, of Virginia, in his inaugural address, on the subject of immigration says:

The department of agriculture has been instrumental in bringing to this State several thousand of immigrants from the Northwest, who have purchased homes and now constitute a part of our best citizens and most prosperous farmers. There is a great scarcity of farm labor in this State, which must be supplied. Not much more than half of our land is under cultivation. Progress and prosperity demand that this uncultivated half should be converted into fertile and yielding farms. The cheapness and fertility of our lands, the superbness of our climate, the nearness and accessibility of our markets, the great demand for labor, must necessarily soon bring a large immigration to Virginia. Wisdom requires that we should as early as possible endeavor to control and guide the character of this immigration, so that it may bring us an elevation, not a deterioration, of citizenship. Better have no immigration, better let much of our land remain waste and unoccupied, than have injected in our populations persons whose principles are a menace to civilization and presence a curse to society.

The correspondent adds:

These are sentiments which the South generally should heed. She has great quantities of rich lands standing idle for want of people to cultivate them; and if cultivated they would yield handsomely to the cultivators and contribute to the upbuilding of that whole section. But it is not a question of rushing numbers in and filling up with Tom, Dick, and Harry. Something more—a very great deal, indeed—is necessary than the mere tilling of the soil. The people who till it should be worthy of American citizenship and bent on acquiring and exercising it. They should not be, as Governor Swanson declares, "a menace to civilization and a curse to society."

While addressed to the people of Virginia, this deliverance of the new governor of the Old Dominion is in its larger features worthy of national attention and application, and marks its author as worthy of the confidence his people have reposed in him.

The problem is, under our immigration laws, how to get the best class of immigration and at the same time exclude the undesirable classes, which imperil our development and endanger our free institutions and lower the standard of American labor. Of the more than 1,000,000 immigrants who came into the country during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, an increase of 213,629 over the fiscal year 1904, it is safe to say that three-fourths, certainly the great majority, came from Austria-Hungary, Russia, Italy, the races of southern Europe, and from Syria.

The Commissioner-General of Immigration says in this connection:

The countries which may be regarded as the chief sources of future increase in immigration are those two in Europe which have the greatest resources in population to dispense with—Russia and Austria-Hungary.

He says that nearly 700,000 of these immigrants brought amounts of money with them less than $50. He declares that—

One of the most significant features of immigration is the large increase in the number of idiots, insane persons, and paupers during the past year, which, coupled with an increase of 25 per cent in the number of diseased aliens, justifies the Immigration Bureau in directing attention to the flagrant and willful disregard by ocean steamers of the laws for the regulation of their business in securing alien passengers destined for the United States.

He declares—

Of the various features of the immigration law, none has proved so difficult of enforcement as that which was passed for the protection of labor in this country over unfair competition by aliens.

Referring to the large number of aliens imported into the country in the interest of great corporations, already highly protected under the high protective tariff of the Republican party, he insists that—

Congress was influenced by the right principle when it forbade those classes which are the primary beneficiaries of our protective duty to import alien labor and thus absorb all of the benefits of that duty, deprive labor of its proper proportion of such benefit, and condemn to idleness or to comparatively inadequate compensation that large body of American citizens whose brawn, intelligence, and industry are such essential features of our national prosperity.

Concluding his most excellent report, the Commissioner-General of Immigration further declares:

It is no longer sufficient to close the door upon certain classes, manifestly undesirable additions to any community. The aliens who are forbidden admission to the United States by section 2 of the act of March 3, 1903, are as objectionable to the communities in which they are born, and of which they have always formed a part, as they are to us. It can not be denied that of such that are not expressly excluded by law there are many aliens entering the United States who, if not individually open to objection on the score of physical, mental, or moral defects, admitted by all men, are yet of such total alien, if not repugnant character and genius, as to raise a doubt whether they will in the course of succeeding years become assimilated.

This view has found expression as yet in legislation affecting aliens of but one race, but that solitary instance, however, is a recognition of the principle that the welfare of the people at this stage of the world's development calls for the Government to prevent an unrestricted irruption of elements hostile to our free institutions, if not incapable of comprehending them.

He then recommends further restriction of immigration and certain amendments of the immigration laws. Adopting his recommendations in part, I have introduced into the House a bill of my own upon this subject. This bill adds to the excluded classes, so that, with the amendment to the immigration laws proposed by my bill, the ignorant, vicious, lawless, aged, imbecile, weak-minded, those of poor physique, and the paupers of the Old World, all of whom are a menace to our institutions, are refused admission into the country. The bill offered by myself also increases the head tax. It increases the penalties imposed upon transportation companies for violation of immigration laws, and it provides for thorough physical examination and more rigid inspection at the port of embarkation.

Now, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that, looking at this matter in the fairest and most impartial light, and with due regard to all sections of the country and our people, in accordance with the views of the eminent officials whom I have mentioned and my own views and a thorough investigation of the subject, some such legislation is necessary, not only in the interest of American labor but also for the best interests of our free institutions. It has been said that it is the theory of our Government that America is the "land of the free and the home of the brave," and that we must have immigration to keep pace with the growth and prosperity of the country. But it can not be denied by anyone that the class of immigration that has been coming into the country in recent years from the races of southern Europe, and from Turkey, in Asia, some of it the very scum and riff-raff of European and Asiatic countries, is not desirable, and that it is against the interest of American labor, and that it will, if allowed to continue, eventually affect and influence our American institutions.

The kind of immigrants we want are the thrifty, industrious citizens of northern Europe, who can be assimilated with our population and add real strength to the United States—those described in the following article from a North Carolina newspaper in my district:

TO EUROPE FOR IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. M. F. H. Gouverneur, vice-president of the Carolina Trucking and Development Company, of Wilmington, is soon to leave for Europe in the interest of his company. He will spend his time in northern Germany and Holland in an effort to induce immigration to eastern North Carolina, and place them on lands owned by the company. The company owns more than 300,000 acres in the counties of New Hanover, Pender, Duplin, Brunswick, Bladen, Columbus, and Robeson.

Farmers of the German and Holland class are usually successful, and of the order called "hustlers." For intense farming they are unexcelled, and are just the people required in a country that needs development. That some of them may be placed in Pender County, we hope.

In the First Congress, when a bill was offered to encourage immigration and provide for naturalization, James Madison, the leader of the House, said:

It is no doubt very desirable that we should hold out as many inducements as possible to the worthy part of mankind to come and settle among us and throw their fortunes into a common lot with ours, but it is not our desire to swell the catalogue of the people in numbers; but it is to increase the wealth and strength of the community, and those who acquire the rights of citizenship without adding to the wealth and strength of the community are not the people whom we are in need of. I would be extremely sorry if our rule of naturalization excluded a single person of good family who really meant to incorporate himself into our society. On the other hand, I do not wish that any man should acquire the privilege but such as would be a real addition to the wealth and strength of the United States.

Now, it can not be contended for one moment that the class of aliens who have been coming into the country in recent years either add to the wealth or strength of the country. On the contrary, they are a source of danger and menace and lower the standard of American labor. We can get enough of desirable immigration, whatever may be needed, without admitting undesirable classes. Many of the aliens in recent years who have been coming to this country have no intention of making a permanent residence here. Thomas Jefferson, in his first annual message as President, in 1801, declared that—

The general character and capabilities of a citizen should be communicated only to those manifesting a bona fide purpose to embark their life and fortune permanently with us.

Now, as shown very thoroughly and clearly by Inspector Marcus Braun in his report to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, it is an undeniable truth that both Italy and Hungary regard emigration of their people simply as a temporary absence abroad for the purpose of earning money and bringing it back. He says that he is convinced beyond a doubt that some European countries, agencies, and private individuals are not only continuing to regard this country as the dumping ground of citizens of an undesirable class, but this is coupled with the arrogant and widespread assumption that this country is but an asset of a large number of European powers, subject only to their desires and orders. He says that these facts, if universally known in this country, would drive the blood of humiliation into the face of every true American and a description of it would defy the pen of a Macaulay. He declares that immigrants, inadmissible for reasons other than disease, are constantly brought into the country in large numbers by the concerted action of European governments, steamship agencies, bankers, and schemers of all sorts. The immigration agencies and steamship agencies reap large profits from this indiscriminate immigration, and the large sums of money sent annually to Europe from the United States (according to last year's reports $50,000,000 was thus sent to Austria-Hungary alone) have had a magnetic effect on some governments of Europe and has awakened in them the desire to multiply these shipments of immigrants to the greatest extent possible.

He shows that the Cunard Line, through the activity of its subagents and a contract with the Hungarian Government, cleared last year an income of over $2,000,000 from Hungarian emigration. He shows that many Armenian emigrants to the United States have obtained naturalization papers and as soon as they have earned sufficient money for their needs and comfort have returned supplied with American citizenship papers, which they obtained legally or illegally, as the case may be. He declares that our consul at Beirut said that the governor of Mount Lebanon told him recently, if this constant travel from Syria to and from the United States should not cease soon, the United States had better annex the province of Lebanon; that there were at present more American citizens there than Turkish subjects. The United States immigration laws are treated with contempt in Syria. Anybody and everybody is being shipped from there, and the only word known to these immigrants as to their destination is the word "America;" they know nothing else. Every steamer arriving in Syria brings heavy mail from the United States. Large sums of money are received annually from this country, and a constant desire and greediness for more is universally manifested. Ninety-nine per cent of alleged American citizens in Jerusalem do not speak a word of English. Most of them whom he interviewed did not know the name of the street in which they claimed to have resided while in the United States.

Italian emigration, he shows, is encouraged by that Government, which charges a fee for every Government passport issued to an emigrant. The Italians are justified in every respect in fearing a restriction on the part of the United States, as it is evident from the information received in interviews with Italian bankers and ship agents that the amount annually received in Italy from the United States averages $1 a day for every Italian who comes to this country for temporary labor.

Now, this kind of immigration from Austria-Hungary, Russia, Italy, Armenia, and Syria, constituting an undesirable class, most of whom come only for temporary purposes to accumulate money which they send home, eventually returning there themselves, is not the kind of immigration contemplated either by the fathers of the Republic or which is a benefit to the American people. And, as said by Mr. Braun, this stream of undesirable immigration continues and is on the increase. It consists of two classes; first, those who are objectionable by reason of physical, mental, or moral defects, or who are undesirable because they come to this country merely for a temporary stay which they use for the accumulation of money and then return to their native country; and, second, the large number who come here in violation of our alien contract labor laws. The emigration from the Turkish dominions, both European and Asiatic, Braun declares, "is nothing short of a menace to the country. From there we positively get the worst kind of people in the world." He concludes by declaring that—

While there are people of all lands who go to other countries for purposes of business and earning money in various capacities, which is legitimate and to which no exception can be taken, it is an entirely different matter with the great horde of immigrants who have flooded this country during the last decade. They come here, not because of our free institutions, or because they have a desire to advance themselves either materially or intellectually, but because the American dollar is of a much greater purchasing value in their native countries, to which they always remain loyal. They make no effort to learn our language, customs, and views; they do not think of ever becoming citizens or contributing in the least to the development of the country, and if they take the oath of citizenship it is only because it facilitates their purposes here and protects them abroad.

Geographically speaking, the immigrants coming from the north of Europe, if not affected by disease, are the best we get. Those from western and southern Europe are very rarely desirable, even if they can not be excluded by disease or moral defect.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is very clear to my mind, in view of this report and of the information which I can obtain from the various reports and documents upon this subject, that there is no question that the races of northern Europe are the most desirable for us. Those coming from southern Europe, as a general rule, are not a desirable class. It is said the South needs immigration to develop its agricultural and manufacturing resources, but the South does not need the class of undesirable immigration which has been pouring into the country in a constant stream in late years. A late article in the Washington Post, which I have before me and from which I will read, expresses very clearly what, it seems to me, should be our true position on that subject:

LET THE SOUTH SIT STRAIGHT.

Those of our southern friends who have imbibed the European immigrant idea with characteristic enthusiasm and are now mightily alarmed over the prospect of losing some of the projected influx through the cunning machinations of their northern rivals will do well to examine the current reports of Italian activity in certain parts of New York and Pennsylvania.

We note from time to time, in various esteemed contemporaries published beyond the Potomac, editorial injunctions of great solemnity and news accounts of meetings, addresses, and resolutions, all tending to educate the southern public in this connection. White immigration from Europe is necessary [sic] to the upbuilding of the section. With large floods of white laborers from the southern and southwestern districts of that continent, our prosperity will advance by leaps and bounds. Agriculture, commerce, mining, and manufacturing will increase upon a scale of geometrical progression. Everybody will be rich and happy next week, if not sooner. And there you are!

Meanwhile, however, the Post's suggestion stands knocking at the door of recognition. Why not take a good look at the fruits of Italian and Slav immigration in other parts of the country before trying it by wholesale for ourselves? We have had very little experience of this kind at the South, and that, in most instances, has been discouraging.

But why should the South open its doors to a new invasion of this kind? It is sufficiently notorious that Italy, Hungary, and the Danubian provinces are anything but anxious, or even willing, to send us their virtuous, wholesome, and desirable peasantry. They are all blessed with these industrious, worthy, and valuable elements of population, but our agents in that part of the world know that we receive very little infusion from those sources. European governments are only too anxious to deport their criminals and degenerates, and it is of record that we have been only too incautious in the matter of receiving them. It does not follow, however, that southern communities need give asylum and opportunity to these outlaws. The South is growing richer every day with the material already at its disposal. Why imperil the certainty of a splendid and a sound development by adventure in strange fields with sinister and abhorrent instruments?

It is no doubt true that the South will be benefited by an increase of population and of industrial material, but the South can well afford to move carefully in this regard. As things now stand, its prosperity is assured. Our southern friends need only hold aloof from perilous experiment in order to reap the promise now beckoning from sure ground.

Such immigration as comes into the South and into the country should be the best possible and the most desirable.

Now, Mr. Chairman, after the alien, if desirable, is admitted into the country under our laws there is another important question connected with this subject, namely, the proper distribution of immigrants. It is proposed in order to properly distribute desirable immigrants for farm labor in the South as well as in the West that an agent of the State, or two or more States, shall be stationed in New York for the purpose of furnishing information to immigrants and to aid them in determining where they should locate; information as to resources, products, climate, soil, etc., of the various States and Territories.

A constant stream of immigration has been going to the West in view of the inducements offered by that section of the country and representations made by its agents.

The third important division of this subject of immigration is the naturalization of aliens. From an examination of the report of the Commission of Naturalization and study of the subject, I am inclined to think that the naturalization laws should be so revised as to require uniformity of certificates, confining the jurisdiction of naturalization of aliens to United States courts or State courts of record, and that no alien should be naturalized or entitled to the privileges of an elector until he shall have resided in the United States for five years at least and is able to read intelligently and write.

I trust that the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization will at least so revise the immigration and naturalization laws as to put a stop to this ceaseless flow of undesirable immigration of aliens, competing with and lowering the standard of American labor in the shop and in the factory and upon the farm; people incapable of comprehending our form of government, incapable of assimilation, a menace to our free institutions, and dangerous to our American ideas and civilization.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if there is one subject that has been well disputed in the last five years, it is the proposition for the establishment of a naval station at Olongapo, in the Philippine Islands. Inasmuch as I have listened during five years to at least a hundred days of argument for and against that proposition, I feel myself quite well informed upon it. I suffer the disadvantage of not having been in the Philippine Islands. I enjoy the opportunity, however, of saying that I never will be in the Philippine Islands unless I am put into a condition of body and mind wherein I have no power to resist. Nevertheless, if I had my way about it, I would fortify Manila because the city belongs to the Philippine Islands and I would fortify Subig Bay because it belongs to the people of the United States. I am sorry I have not had the advantage of gentlemen who made the excursion last year. I was not expected and therefore I did not go, but I have listened to and have heard from men who have not been there one day, two days, or five days, but who have spent one year, two years, and three years in the islands, upon the proposition of establishing a naval station in the Philippine Islands. Furthermore than that I am benefited by the advice of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, a gentleman who has spent perhaps one day or two days on the spot, not 4 miles from the place where this station is to be located and being thus 4 miles away gives a bird's-eye view and then makes a guess at it, but who went upon the ground for the purpose of informing himself and his colleagues on the Committee on Naval Affairs—and I refer to the chairman of that committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss]. We are well satisfied not only with his observations, but with the report that he has already made to us. If the committee will bear with me for two or three minutes, I desire to say that there is no place in the United States, there is no place in any of the possessions of the United States, so well adapted for a naval station as at that found in Subig Bay. There is no place in the United States where a naval station is either projected or established that we do not have to dig mud in order to get a ship to it with perhaps the exception of Bremerton. Up to the spot where the steel dry dock that this Government has built within the last year there are found 60 feet of water, which a civilian who spent a year there told us the other day Providence itself had provided and which Providence had maintained. There has been no change whatever in that channel—not a tortuous, dangerous channel, but one that is a mile wide, one that flows between high mountains, not in a straight line where bullets may fly and projecting shells may go to strike our ships, but one that is protected in any point of its course by high mountains through which ships' guns can not send their missiles of death and destruction. This channel winds around for 7 miles, a mile in width, and for one-half that width there are 60 feet of water and there has been this depth for years and years. Sixty feet of water are found from the ocean up to the very place where we propose to establish a dry dock. Let me go back to the origin of this programme. If there was one subject the Administration had an interest in three years ago, it was the proposition to establish a station at Olongapo, in the Philippine Islands.

If there was any estimate that was suggested by Secretary Moody with all of the earnestness that that gentleman possessed, it was that we should establish this station, and his reasons were sensible to us and we adopted them and established the station there. Following upon that we made an appropriation of $1,250,000 for a dry dock, which is now on the road to the Philippines, where there is no other place to put it except in Subig Bay. Men who testified within the last week agreed all around that there is no water at Manila in which you can use this dry dock. It will either go to Subig Bay or you will tie it up in the ocean somewhere or bring it home. It was built especially for that point and it was not built for any other.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman from Iowa. Mr. Chairman, to repeat what I have already said, this has been a disturbing question with one branch of the Government. My friend the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] knows that to be so. The commission that was sent to the islands searched everywhere to find deep water, and I would like to assure the gentlemen who are listening to me—and if the others will listen for one minute I will assure them also—that never again, as I live upon this earth, will I vote one dollar for a naval station where you have not sufficient depth of water upon which to float ships to the stations of repair. The great depth of water at this point impressed us all favorably. The further assurance of the Government authorities that no dredging would be needed at this point for years to come impressed us also favorably, and was a strong inducement to favorable action.

If this dry dock continues on its course and does not upset before it reaches Manila it will go to Subig Bay, where we have tentatively provided for its reception. The Committee on Naval Affairs has agreed tentatively on appropriations for Alongapo. They will not reach $200,000. The committee has made an appropriation for a channel to drain the swamp near where this dry dock will be located, costing perhaps fifteen or twenty thousand dollars. They have further tentatively agreed upon one item in the bill of perhaps sixty or eighty thousand dollars to build, not to dig, but to build from the shops that the Spaniards located there a pier to connect them with this dry dock, which of itself contains a machine shop.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman——

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Not for a minute, please. Mr. Chairman, another proposition that satisfied us very well was that even the Spaniards had concluded to abandon Manila and had built some sort of shops at Subig Bay. The Spaniards concluded to leave Manila for the reason they could not keep sufficient depth of water there in which to float their ships. A naval officer and a civil engineer testified the other day that there is no place in the Philippine Islands in which a battle ship can be docked except at Subig Bay. They further testified that the water about Cavite was subject to obstruction from moving sand that continually fills in the dredging. They say that is their experience, and were positive in their advice to us that we should abandon Cavite not entirely, but to look forward toward establishing a station at Subig Bay. Acting largely, I suppose, upon their advice as well as upon the advice given us heretofore, we concluded that for the time being we will ask this House to permit us to stay in Subig Bay. Not that we will adopt, Mr. Chairman, the estimates handed us by the Navy Department for millions of dollars at Subig Bay, but we will recommend to this House, at the proper season, a modest item carrying a modest amount for improvements at this place. It is true that the Government has a programme which, if carried out, will involve the expenditure of twelve or fifteen million dollars. It is true that the Government has even recommended more than twelve or fifteen million dollars. I may say to my friend from New York it is true that heads of Departments and other officials have recommended $43,000,000 for navy-yards and for construction and maintenance, but it does not follow because gentlemen make such estimates that Congress will immediately and without inquiry approve them, but the provisions that have already been, as I have said, tentatively agreed upon will be all that the Government will need for the time being in the Philippines.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I would like to say just one thing more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield to the gentleman three minutes because I want to ask him a question.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I am very much obliged, and I will divide my time with the gentleman when he asks the question. Another strong inducement to this is this, and I speak knowingly upon this subject, because I am advised by people living at Subig Bay, and we have lived there for months, that the health of the place is almost perfect. Right on this landlocked harbor they have cool nights; nights in which they can enjoy their sleep. There are in that place from six to eight hundred, maybe a thousand, marines collected for some purpose in the East I know not of, but about which I have read, and the health of these men is good, very good. There is no sick; there is no real discomfort in these cool mountains, in this landlocked harbor, surrounded by high hills that nature itself has provided, which some day should stand as a protection to us against an enemy.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to inquire of the gentleman if he was not aware in the navy appropriation act signed on the 27th of April, 1904, there was an item for dredging the basin in front of the quay walls for the floating dry dock of $48,000?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. At Subig Bay?

Mr. FITZGERALD. At Subig Bay.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have it here.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. My friend is asking a question, and I have no doubt it is true, but the money has not been all used; but the purpose of establishing that dry dock at that point——

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not a dry dock that it is proposed to build, but it is in order to enable the Navy Department to use the floating dry dock that is now on the way there, and it took $48,000 so far to do this. How much more is required, in spite of the statement that they have unlimited water, nobody in this Government knows.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am not able to do so. I am very sorry to confess my ignorance, but I am unable to answer. I can not remember all of these different propositions. It is possible for one to sit down, of course, and pick out an item here and there and ask a question concerning it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I would ask that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] use up some of his time now if possible.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has thirty-seven minutes and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] has thirty-five minutes remaining.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES].

[Mr. JONES of Virginia addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS].

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word at this time upon the question of the location of our naval station in the Philippines. I presume it is a matter which will come also in the regular order upon our naval bill, and it was my intention at that time to go into the question quite extensively and not speak upon the fortification bill at this time; but inasmuch as the question has come up I would like to say a few words upon it now.

The question of the location of a naval station in the Philippines was, in my judgment, settled by Congress two years ago. At that time we had before us the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Moody, and also the report of the board which had investigated this question as to the proper location of our naval base in the Philippines, and upon that testimony and the testimony of other officers the committee reported upon the wisdom of establishing a naval base at Olongapo. That matter was properly before this House. The importance of it was stated in the report which I had the honor to submit at that time. A naval reservation was set apart for the Navy at Olongapo. The reservation is 4 or 5 miles square. I might go into the reading of the testimony which was before the committee and some of which was read on the floor of this House as to the advantages of this particular site. Secretary Moody said that he had been—all over the subject and every single bit of information is in favor of establishing it within Subig Bay at Olongapo. Nobody disagrees. The Army and the Navy alike say that it is the place to put it. There is plenty of water, and protection at the entrance may be made perfect.

Admiral Dewey was before the committee, and he said, having given the subject a great deal of study:

I am convinced that Subig Bay is the one place in the Philippines for a naval base.

Later on he says:

There is no necessity of spending much money on it at first. I suppose that in the course of time it will grow, but it is of the first importance that we should have a dry dock somewhere in the Philippines, and this dock should be protected by guns.

Now, I could go into the whole discussion of this subject and bring you the testimony of naval officers who have looked into this question. There has never been a commander in chief of our fleet in the East who has not come back here after a thorough investigation and study of this question and said to us, this is the proper place for the naval base in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Was Admiral Dewey ever in Subig Bay in his life?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; he went in there to find the Spanish fleet before he went into Manila Bay.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. My information is the other way.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question? Was Admiral Dewey in as far as the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. FOSS. I think he was in a great deal farther.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I will say to my friend that my information is that he was not.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Well, the gentleman from Virginia knows how far he was in.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. And there is a Member of this House who was with him, from whom I have got my information—a gentleman on the Republican side of the Chamber.

Mr. FOSS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that not only our naval authorities are firmly convinced of this, but upon their advice we made an appropriation in this House of over $800,000 toward its establishment, of which $500,000 was toward the establishment of a coaling station and $300,000 toward the establishment of a navy-yard. That was two years ago. Contracts have already been let for that coaling station, so we are expending this appropriation to-day.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman state when he got that appropriation?

Mr. FOSS. Two years ago. And since that time we have added $100,000 more to it. Now, the naval officers were convinced at that time and are convinced now—and I have talked with Admiral Dewey and members of the naval board who have had this whole matter under consideration—and they are more convinced to-day than they were then that that is the place for our naval station. Well, what else? Why, the joint board of Army and Navy officers have also had this thing under consideration and this is from their report. The Lieutenant-General, if I remember, of the Army was a member of that board, as was also the Admiral of the Navy. What is it?

First. That without a fortified naval base in the Philippines the Asiatic Fleet can not keep open the lines of communication for supplies from the United States or between the Army posts within the Philippines, without which supplies the military forces of the United States could not hold command of the islands.

Second. That Manila is not but that Subig Bay is suited for a naval base and station, and of all harbors in the archipelago—and the harbor which has been spoken of by the gentleman from Virginia included—it is the best for the purpose.

Third. That the fortification of Subig Bay is essential to the security of a naval station located there.

That is the opinion of the joint board of the Army and Navy. It seems to me that it almost ought to be considered res adjudicata. And upon that report we have appropriated money for this naval station. Now, gentlemen come in here who perhaps have journeyed over to the Philippines as I went and have expressed their opinions as to whether this is a fitting place or not for a naval station. Now, I want to ask you seriously whether you think they are competent to judge. I tried to induce a large number of that company one day to go with me up to Olongapo from Manila, and there was only one gentleman whom I could induce and he was a member of the committee—Mr. LOUD. We went up and investigated and looked over this place and came back, but other gentlemen who have seen fit here to say something against this location of this station have never been there and did not go with us at that time. Now, gentlemen have also said Generals So-and-so do not believe that this place is the best place.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. But I did not; I said General Wood and General Corbin.

Mr. FOSS. Well, General Wood and General Corbin are able Army generals, but I do not know that they have ever acquired any great reputation in this country as naval experts, and I will follow them when it comes to Army matters. I will follow them when they tell me where we ought to put the barracks of our Army or where we ought to put the fortifications for the Army here or there; gladly will I follow them. Why? Because they are educated along that line. But when it comes to the Navy, I will follow the opinion of naval officers—the men whom we have sent to the Naval Academy and educated in naval affairs, who are familiar with that particular line of Government service. Their testimony and their opinion I will follow, but I will not follow the opinion of any Army officer on the question of a location of a naval station.

Now, Mr. Chairman, another thing. We have got a naval station down at Cavite. We have been using it for a number of years, or ever since we have been in the Philippines. It is a small Spanish station, and the committee has recommended appropriations to no large extent for it. We have gone along with this with its costing the Government but very little money in the shape of repairs now and then, and we have been doing very good work there, but looking to the future of the establishment of a permanent naval place, the Navy Department has come to the conclusion that it would not do to stay at Cavite. Why?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSS. I will ask a few minutes more. I have been down at Cavite, and I know the condition there.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will yield five minutes more time to the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. FOSS. They have got 47 acres of land at Cavite. I went over it—drove around it. It is all covered with buildings, and you can not get any more buildings there. It is an old Spanish naval station. You can not get a battle ship, according to the testimony of Admiral Dewey—and it has been confirmed during the last few weeks by testimony of naval officers before our committee—within 2 miles of Cavite, within 2 miles of the naval station. It is going to cost millions of dollars to dredge around this naval station in order to get your ships up there. Then what next? Why, you have got to have more land for your naval station, and the naval officers say that they have got to make land out into the water, and that means the large proposition of dredging and filling in, and then after you have done that, what have have you got? A naval station of a hundred acres, perhaps, with an expenditure of $10,000,000 or so.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Will the gentleman permit one question right there?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Will the gentleman tell me how much level ground there is at Olongapo now available?

Mr. FOSS. Well, I did not go all over it.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I thought you went and examined it.

Mr. FOSS. But I went over some of it. We have got over 500 marines there. We have got marine barracks; we have got the old Spanish buildings which were a part of the naval station which they had there years ago, and we propose to use those. Then, there is a town or village off a little ways, and this level tract of land, which is larger, I may say, than my friend's front yard——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. It might be that and not be very large.

Mr. FOSS. There is quite an expanse of level land there, and I will say to my friend, I would not want to walk over it all in a day, but there is a village there of 600 Filipinos. There is plenty of land there to build a naval station—plenty of land.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Plenty of level land without digging down the mountain side?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; plenty of level land without digging down the mountain side.

Some gentleman has stated there are some rivers that run down through there and that some of the land is wet and marshy, but that can be drained off.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. It is only 2 feet above the level of the bay.

Mr. FOSS. I do not know how many feet, but it is down very near to the water's edge.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. With a river running through it.

Mr. FOSS. Very near to the water's edge, and it has been in that condition for hundreds of years, they tell me. And it has never been overflowed, so they tell me. The water in this perfectly landlocked harbor is very smooth, and it is considered the best place for our naval station by men who know—not only by men who know, but by men whose business it is to know.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Let me ask my friend if he remembers how long that civil engineer lived there?

Mr. FOSS. It seems to me he said a year or two years.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. A Government engineer?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. FOSS. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, the gentleman has said something about the advice of men whose business it is to know. Upon whose advice did we establish this naval station at Cavite?

Mr. FOSS. That was the old Spanish station, established by the Spaniards.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, upon whose advice did we spend money there, and make appropriations, and continue a naval station there?

Mr. FOSS. We did it upon the Navy Department's advice.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Are they not people whose business it is to know? Now, the gentleman tells us Cavite is thoroughly unfitted for that purpose.

Mr. FOSS. Yes; we took the old Spanish station. We had a fleet there, and we had to repair our ships. That is the station the Spaniards had used for years, so we took that station temporarily for the purpose of repairing our ships.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seventeen minutes remaining.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just one minute, in order for the gentleman to answer this question. That is all.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I grant the time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand, we took a place 2 miles from where a ship could possibly land, continued it as a naval station upon the advice of people whose business it was to know, and spent how many millions of dollars? How much have we spent there?

Mr. FOSS. I should say not over two or three hundred thousand dollars in repairs to this old Spanish naval station; but I do not want to let that statement go which the gentleman has made, that no ship could get within 2 miles of there.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I so understood the gentleman a few moments ago.

Mr. FOSS. No battle ship.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, that is the kind of ship I am talking about. A naval station is used for battle ships.

Mr. FOSS. Surely.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I will grant the gentleman three minutes longer.

Mr. FOSS. Now, this is our present situation, Mr. Chairman. We have made these appropriations. Congress has established this naval station. We have built a dry dock, and that dry dock is on its way over there, and there is not any place where you can put it except in Subig Bay. Oh, you can put it in Manila Bay, but Manila Bay is a place where there are frequent storms. You can not put that dock over there and moor it safely unless you put it in still water somewhere; and our naval authorities have said that there is only one place there, in their judgment, in which to put it, and that is in Subig Bay—first, because the water is quiet and still, where they can put our ships into dock and work on them, and then, in the second place, where there is a sufficient depth of water, 60 feet, which we must have for that dock. Will these honorable experts, who know so much about the situation over there and talk against Olongapo, tell us of some spot in Manila Bay, anywhere, where you can safely moor this dock and where there is sufficient water near the shore in which to do so?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman say there is sufficient water at Olongapo?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then why, in 1904, did you appropriate in your appropriation bill $48,000 with which to dredge for that dock?

Mr. FOSS. Why, my dear friend, there is not a harbor in all the world anywhere that you can use for commercial purposes, to say nothing about naval purposes, but what you have got to expend a little money for dredging.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, $50,000 is a pretty good sum where I live for dredging; it may not be at Manila or Olongapo.

Mr. FOSS. Why, you have had hundreds of thousands of dollars expended for that purpose in New York Harbor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Four per cent of all the appropriations for rivers and harbors have been expended at New York, and it carries 65 per cent of all the exports of this country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FOSS. Well, now, Mr. Chairman, I would just like one minute more simply to state the situation. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. FOSS. We have got that dock on the way, going over to the Philippine Islands. We have got to put it somewhere, and it is bound for Subig Bay, I want Congress to know. It is because that is the only place where we have sufficient depth of water, and it is regarded as the only suitable site for a naval station. Now, after that dock is over there, we have got to connect it with the land, and we are going to build out a little pier that will cost $65,000, and that appropriation will be carried in the naval appropriation bill. We are going to give them a few tools, that will amount to about $100,000, to repair our ships—not to make expensive repairs, but for them to do just small repairs. Whenever any expensive repairs are needed the ships will come home to our own people at our own yards under the appropriations that we are allowing in the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman from New York use some of his time now?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have been sitting here listening to the debate since the House resumed its work this morning, and I have heard nothing but dollars, thousands, millions; expenditures, expenditures, expenditures! Philippine burdens galore. When is it going to end?

I find, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman who has just taken his seat states that less than two years ago we appropriated for the Philippine improvements—did you say $8,000,000 or $800,000.

Mr. FOSS. Over $800,000 at Olongapo.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And $500,000 somewhere else?

Mr. FOSS. I do not know that I said anything about that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You said $500,000 for something——

Mr. FOSS. I say of this $800,000, $500,000 of it went toward the building of a coal plant.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And then $300,000 for something else; and then, in addition to that, $100,000 more, you said.

Mr. Chairman, here we come to-day with a bill that appropriates $600,000 for guns for the Philippine Islands and Hawaii. Four hundred thousand of that for the Philippine Islands, I believe, and $200,000 for Hawaii. I will not read the details, but give the "totals" of the appropriations carried in this bill, as shown by this report we all have.

Total, fortifications and other works of defense, 1906, $2,414,400. Estimates for 1907, $2,860,900.

Now, then, "Total armament and fortifications, 1906, $2,988,550;" nearly $3,000,000. "Estimates for 1907, $2,913,009.90; recommended for 1907, $1,882,000." Then we go over a page or two, and under the head of "Insular possessions" we find the money appropriated for that amounted in 1906—I would like to get the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] to the table on page 4 of the report, and have him explain these figures to me. Look where you say "total," at the bottom of the page, "appropriations for 1906, $6,747,893." "Estimates for 1907, $8,953,112.90; recommended, $4,838,993." Now, that is the "total" of what?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The total for this purpose.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much for Hawaii and all the islands?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. One million eighty-seven thousand dollars.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, we learn from the words of this report that we seem to be engaged in doing nothing but spending the American people's money in fortifying for war and making a great military port out of the Philippine Islands. We have to make, in order to hold these islands, a navy on a parity with "any navy in the world," a navy to successfully cope with all the world. We must keep a "standing army" as long as it can stand, outside of coffins, in the Philippine Islands; we must keep up an endless chain of sending our able-bodied sons to the Philippine Islands and retain them out there as long as we can keep them out of a coffin and able to shoulder a musket.

As the result of this colonialism, we must keep a standing army in peace three times larger than we had when the Spanish war began, and Uncle Sam foots the bill. All this, and more I won't recite, by way of parenthesis, gentlemen. Notice we have no deficiencies in our colonial appropriations. Plenty of money for those purposes.

Do you know that on Saturday last the Treasury Department stopped forty elevators in various custom-houses in the United States, because of a lack of money to run the elevators?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That was not because there was not money enough in the Treasury, but because it had not been appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But you cut down our home appropriations low enough to allow these colonial appropriations. I got notice of this from the postmaster at Nashville Monday, about the Nashville elevator. Protests from the officers in the magnificent Government building at Nashville were sent me. There are some ten or twelve different departments located in this half-million-dollar custom-house.

I got protests from Postmaster A. W. Wills, from the United States district attorney, the marshal, the collector of internal revenue and of customs, from the court clerk, Mr. Doak, from the Weather Bureau, from the superintendent of the southern free rural delivery, Mr. Conger, and a number of other officers. There are many heads of departments on second, third, and fourth floors of this building, who must walk up and down the stairways, as well as all the witnesses who go to attend sessions of the Federal courts there, held by Circuit Judge Lurton and District Judge Clark.

The business of this great country is embarrassed in this way simply because the last Congress did not appropriate enough money to run the Government along those lines. Yet we find no deficiencies in the Philippine appropriations, but we find them in appropriations for our home people.

I went to the Treasury Department yesterday morning, and I was pretty red hot about this, I want to say. Nashville has about 130,000 people, and has always been a great city. She has produced two Speakers of this House—John Bell and James K. Polk. Nashville was the home of Andrew Jackson and James K. Polk, Presidents of the United States. We have produced two judges of the United States Supreme Court—Judge Howell E. Jackson and Judge John Catron. Circuit Judge H. H. Lurton lives and holds court there. Judge Clark holds the district court there. In one suit, involving over a million and a half dollars, about 1,500 witnesses, I am told, have been examined in this building, and it is not concluded.

And yet, Mr. Chairman, we did not appropriate enough money in the last Congress to run the elevators in that great building in that magnificent city, and there are thirty-nine other Government buildings in this country which are in the same sad plight to-day. You gentlemen will get letters about it if you have not already received them.

Why didn't you appropriate this money, gentlemen? Simply because you were, as now, taking the tax money paid by the people in this country and building up the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico and various other outside places, instead of looking after your own people at home. [Applause.] Our river and harbor works are suffering for the same reason.

Mr. SIMS. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Perhaps we have not very many great men in our district, but we claim Howell E. Jackson as a citizen of my district. He was born there and lived there until he was 50 years old.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You are not so hard up for great men in your district that you need to take any of ours away from us.

Mr. SIMS. We can not spare any of them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Judge Jackson formerly lived in Jackson and Memphis; but after his election to the Senate of the United States and while on the Supreme Bench—until his death—he lived near Nashville, at West Meade, where he died.

Mr. SIMS. You said your district produced him.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I meant the State produced him. He lived at Nashville. We have other men as good as he was, and he was good enough. He killed himself in his efforts to uphold our income-tax law of 1894, and he knew it would.

Mr. SIMS. He lived at Jackson, Tenn., when he was made judge, and that is in my district.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think you are mistaken, but that is immaterial.

Mr. SIMS. He was living at Jackson, Tenn., when he was appointed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; he was living at Nashville, West Meade, and I sent him a letter there about his trying for this supreme judgeship.

Mr. SIMS. We would like to have the gentleman himself in our district.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thank my colleague for the compliment of the suggestion.

Now, gentlemen, I ask you seriously, whither are you going? I am not taking politics now, I am talking about an outrage in common we have imposed on our people.

I went into the room of the Committee on Appropriations a few minutes ago to get the names of the cities where these custom-house elevators were stopped, and the clerk of the committee informed me that he had sent down to get the list.

The chief clerk of the Treasury Department told me yesterday there were forty elevators that had been recently stopped, and these judges at Nashville, some of them old men, have to climb up two or three flights of stairs, and so do all the other people who have any business with the Government, except with the post-office on the ground floor. Gentlemen, I think you are carrying your expenditures in the Philippines a little too far. I think you had better stay at home a little bit with your money. I think you had better look after your town people. I think we had better look after our own people instead of going across the ocean, twenty-eight days' travel from our own country, trying to find a hole in or under the water where we can spend millions and millions of money that ought to be spent here at home; at least our home people should first be fully cared for.

Mr. CANDLER. They stopped the elevators at Memphis and at Birmingham.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; I guess that is true. Now, gentlemen, I am not going to say, "I told you so."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee one minute more.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, gentlemen, I am going to read from Thomas Jefferson's third annual message. He often warned us to stay on this side of the world. He said:

> Separated by a wide ocean from the nations of Europe and from the political interests which entangle them together, with productions and wants which render our commerce and friendship useful to them and theirs to us, it can not be the interest of any to assail us, nor ours to disturb them.
> We should be most unwise, indeed, were we to cast away the singular blessings of the position in which nature has placed us, the opportunity she has endowed us with of pursuing, at a distance from foreign contentions, the paths of industry, peace, and happiness, of cultivating general friendship, and of bringing collisions of interest to the umpirage of reason rather than of force.

These burdens all come from not following the old Democratic doctrine of staying at home, where "nature" put us. [Applause.]

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I now yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE].

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and as a part of my remarks to print a petition or statement of grievances from the bituminous coal league of Pennsylvania—the operators and shippers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD, and to print the petition to which he has referred.

Mr. PAYNE. On what subject?

Mr. GILLESPIE. The grievance of the bituminous coal operators and shippers of Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. To have it appear in the RECORD as a part of his remarks, and to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. PAYNE. I object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope the gentleman from New York will not object, because we agreed to a shortening of the time for general debate.

Mr. PAYNE. The House ought to hear it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the gentleman from New York wouldn't stay here and listen to it.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to hear it now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas be granted time to read it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas be granted time to read the memorial. I understand the gentleman from New York will agree to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the time for general debate was fixed by the House, and can not be changed in the committee. The time is controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], but the time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent that the committee may rise in order that the proposal may be submitted to the House.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has twelve minutes remaining.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, in order that the elevator men of the Nashville public building and my very distinguished friend from Tennessee may feel relieved, I send to the Clerk's desk an extract from the Cincinnati Inquirer of February 1, which I ask to have read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEFICIT—ALMOST ALL WIPED OUT—AND UNCLE SAM EXPECTS TO BE RID OF IT ENTIRELY WITHIN THIRTY DAYS.

WASHINGTON, February 1, 1906.

The monthly statement of the Government receipts and expenditures, issued to-day, shows a condition of the Treasury which is eminently satisfactory to the officials. One year ago to-day there was a deficit of over $28,500,000, which has now been reduced to less than $3,400,000, with the prospect that this amount will be entirely wiped out within the next thirty days. It is pointed out that to-day there is an available cash balance on hand, including deposits in national banks, of nearly $144,000,000, with the daily receipts more than equaling the expenditures. This improved condition is due almost entirely to large increases in customs and internal-revenue receipts. During January the customs receipts alone amounted to $26,889,912, which is an excess over January, 1905, of over $4,500,000, and since July 1 last the customs receipts have exceeded those for the corresponding period last year by over $22,500,000. During the same period internal-revenue receipts have increased over $9,000,000. The expenditures last month were about $2,250,000 less than for January, 1905, principally on account of reduced interest payments.

The monthly statement of the public debt department issued to-day shows that the debt, less cash in the Treasury, amounts to $991,524,646, which is a decrease for the month of $3,345,072. The debt is recapitulated as follows: Interest-bearing debt, $895,159,180; debt on which interest has ceased since maturity, $1,170,825; debt bearing no interest, $389,079,673; total, $1,285,409,678. This amount, however, does not include $1,615,264,869 in certificates and Treasury notes outstanding, which are offset by an equal amount of cash on hand held for their redemption.

The cash in the Treasury is classified as follows: Gold reserve, $150,000,000; trust funds, $1,615,264,869; general fund, $169,953,761; in national bank depositories, $61,343,643; in Philippine treasury, $5,148,603; total, $1,404,710,877, against which there are demand liabilities outstanding amounting to $1,110,825,795, leaving a balance on hand of $293,885,982. Deducting the $150,000,000 gold reserve leaves an available cash balance on hand of $143,885,082.

The monthly circulation statement issued by the Comptroller of the Currency shows that at the close of business January 31 the total circulation of national-bank notes was $543,230,080, which is an increase for the year of $76,807,227 and an increase for the month of $2,315,733. The total circulation based on United States bonds was $506,365,749, an increase for the year of $70,557,848 and an increase for the month of $1,523,436. The amount of circulation secured by lawful money was $36,864,331, an increase for the year of $5,249,379 and an increase for the month of $792,297. The amount of bonds on deposit to secure circulating notes was $509,901,690 and to secure public deposits, $64,822,800.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, criticism has been made on the floor as to the percentage which this bill appropriates or allots to the insular possessions. That percentage has been overstated. It has been stated that it was practically 25 per cent, when, in fact, it is a little over 20 per cent, and it must be borne in mind that while we have been engaged for eighteen years in appropriating money for the fortification of continental United States we have only been engaged for a brief period in the fortification of the insular possessions. Fortifications for continental United States are in a more advanced state than fortifications of the insular possessions. Not only this, but the insular possessions are chiefly exposed to a hostile attack. With the modern system of wireless telegraphy some one would indeed be at fault if any foreign fleet could reach any United States continental port without finding an American fleet to contend with.

It is impracticable for us to maintain any great fleet perpetually at the Philippine Islands, at the Hawaiian Islands, at the island of Guam, at the island of Porto Rico, and at the Island of Cuba. These island possessions are the most exposed of all our possessions, and they have had the least done for their fortification. Not a gun is yet mounted in the insular possessions, but several will be by the end of next June. We are far in advance at home of what we have done for these people, and I should be loath to see one dollar cut off the appropriations proposed for the insular possessions, signifying to those people that they are not the subjects of our constant and watchful solicitude and care.

Now, it is contended here that we must violate all the practice of the past by designating, upon the judgment of Congress, where the War Department shall and where it shall not expend this money. It is suggested there was a general scheme under the Endicott board. It was never approved by Congress and never investigated by Congress. There is a general scheme known as the "Taft board plan" for the fortification of continental and insular United States, which is similar to the Endicott scheme.

We propose to appropriate this money as it has always been appropriated, not setting up the judgment of civilians against the judgment of trained men upon this subject. It has been my pleasure to listen to these experts here in the House, and after listening to their conflicting testimony I am compelled to say that I am better satisfied than ever to refer the whole subject to the War Department as to where the fortifications shall be in the Philippines and other insular possessions.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Well, I desire to yield for a moment or two to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has but two minutes remaining.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Very well; what is the question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman believe it is imperative to at once fortify Guantanamo on account of its exposed position; and if he does, why hasn't he made provision for that in this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Because we simply have a right to establish a navy-yard there. Cuba is not ours, and then $180,000 has been set apart for the fortification of Guantanamo and not yet expended, and the Government has nothing there as yet to defend, while at Subig Bay we have more than $2,000,000 already voted for this dry dock, for a coaling station, a naval station, and for other purposes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And we have already allotted $455,000 there for fortifications and have not expended a dollar.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is true, and we have more than $2,000,000 appropriated there exposed to attack and loss at Subig Bay and nothing at Guantanamo, and that is why I would give the War Department a wider discretion at Subig Bay than at Guantanamo.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. GROSVENOR) having resumed the chair, Mr. CURRIER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 14171) making appropriations for fortifications and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa rose.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 14581) to appropriate $25,000 to inclose and beautify the grounds and repair the monument on Moores Creek battlefield, North Carolina, and the same was referred to the Committee on the Library.

REPRINT OF BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair lays before the House the following request of Mr. LORIMER for a reprint of the bill H. R. 12070——

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House to have printed in the RECORD a communication to me in the form of a petition——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will suspend for a moment. The Chair lays before the House the request of Mr. LORIMER for a reprint of the bill (H. R. 12070) making an appropriation for the completion of a 14-foot waterway from Chicago to St. Louis. Without objection, it will be so ordered. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the gentleman from Texas, who makes a personal request.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE] has the floor, and the Chair requested that he suspend for a moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the gentleman will recognize that a motion to adjourn is in order.

Mr. JAMES. But a motion to adjourn does not take the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE] off the floor. He had the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. But, Mr. Speaker, I rose to address the Chair, and was recognized before the gentleman from Texas rose at all.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE] had the floor, had been recognized by the Chair, and the Chair asked him to suspend a moment until the request made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] for a reprint of a certain bill could be put. When that was done, then the recognition came back to the gentleman from Texas, and in the meantime the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] made the motion to adjourn. I insist that the point of order is well taken and that the gentleman from Texas has the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the motion to adjourn for the present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement addressed to me in the form of a petition from the Bituminous Coal Trade League of Pennsylvania, operators and shippers, setting forth their grievances against certain combinations they complain of.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Speaker, for the third time I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has not had the opportunity yet.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now we know you object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a memorial the title of which he has read. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Please let the Chair make a statement. The temporary occupant of the chair desires to say he would not wish to be considered as doing anything unfair. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman from Texas, but asked the gentleman from Texas to suspend his request until the gentleman from Iowa should yield the floor, so the gentleman from Texas did not have the floor. The gentleman from Iowa now moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 49.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, upon this I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi and the gentleman from Iowa will take their places as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 92, noes 53.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, upon this question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 106, nays 64, answered "present" 5, not voting 209, as follows:

That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act, in whole or in part, whenever, in its judgment, the public interest shall so require, without, however, impairing in any wise the obligation of any specific contract then in force which shall have been entered into under the provisions of sections 2, 3, 5, and 6 of this act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, I ask that a reprint of the bill be made showing the amendments adopted in italics and the proposed amendments in small capitals in brackets.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks for a reprint of the bill with the amendments agreed to printed in italics and the amendments pending printed in small capitals——

Mr. GALLINGER. I will not say "small capitals," but in brackets.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Printed in brackets.

Mr. MORGAN. I am preparing, and will have ready in a few seconds, an amendment that I want to go in with the order for a reprint.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well. The clerks will not be ready to send the bill away at once. I hope the clerks will rush this matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SPOONER. If it is convenient to the Senator from New Hampshire, I should like to have him explain one of his amendments which I did not understand fully. I ask him what change he has made in the bill so far as it relates to the navigating force of a ship as contradistinguished from the crew?

Mr. GALLINGER. The amendment I have offered confines it to the navigating force, one-sixth.

Mr. SPOONER. And defines the navigating force as contradistinguished from the cabin force?

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not; but I took it for granted that that was a term which carried its own definition. I think there can be no doubt on that point.

Mr. SPOONER. In what connection is that language used in the amendment? In what part of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. In answer to the interrogatory of the Senator from Wisconsin, I will say that my amendment reads as follows:

On page 8, in line 21, after the word "the," insert the words "navigating force on," and after the word "deck" strike out the word "force," so as to read "and of the navigating force on deck."

Mr. SPOONER. If the amendment were adopted, how would the text read?

Mr. GALLINGER. It would read:

Third. That upon each departure of said vessel from the United States at least one-sixth of the crew shall be citizens of the United States—

By birth or adoption, I believe. I have an old print.

Mr. SPOONER. I have an old print, too, now.

Mr. ALLISON. That is proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is an amendment pending to strike that out, so that they shall be American citizens—and of the navigating force on deck, excluding licensed officers, at least one-half shall be able seamen—

That is the way it will read.

Mr. SPOONER. Does it leave out "who are hereby defined?'

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no—

who are hereby defined to be men who have had two years or more experience at sea on deck.

Mr. SPOONER. Then the Senator wants to leave it so that a lake navigator, no matter how competent he may be, will not be eligible?

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, the provision is subject to further amendment, and if the Senator offers an amendment covering that we will consider it.

Mr. SPOONER. I will offer an amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield, of course.

Mr. MORGAN. I will offer the amendments, and I wish to make a brief explanation of them. They are the result of the investigation that has been made by the Interoceanic Canal Committee, and I think they are very important to be considered.

The first amendment is on page 15, line 4, by inserting after the word "and" the words "port La Boca on;" so as to read:

From a port on the Pacific coast of the United States to Mexico, Central America, and port La Boca on the Isthmus of Panama.

The next amendment is, on page 13, line 8, to strike out the words "a port," after the word "from," and insert "each of two ports;" so as to read: "From each of two ports of the United States on the Gulf of Mexico;" then after the word "Mexico" to insert "and from New Orleans;" and after the word "and," in line 9, to insert "to the port of Cristobal on."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama proposes amendments, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, line 8, after the word "From," strike out the words "a port" and insert the words "each of two ports;" after the word "Mexico," in line 9, insert "and from New Orleans," and after the word "and," in the same line, insert the words "to the port of Cristobal on."

Mr. BACON. Let it be read in full now, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The clause will be read as proposed to be amended.

The SECRETARY. As proposed to be amended it will read:

Sixth. From each of two ports of the United States on the Gulf of Mexico, and from New Orleans to Central America, and to the port of Cristobal on the Isthmus of Panama.

On page 15——

Mr. GALLINGER. Just one moment, Mr. President. I will ask the Senator from Alabama to explain briefly what he purposes to accomplish by that amendment. I understand that it establishes two lines under this subdivision instead of one, to begin with.

Mr. MORGAN. It establishes three lines of ships and defines New Orleans, it being not on the Gulf of Mexico, but 150 miles away.

Mr. GALLINGER. It establishes three lines on the Gulf of Mexico instead of one line in the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; sailing to the Isthmus of Panama.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does not the Senator think that the Gulf of Mexico is pretty well taken care of in the bill as it stands?

Mr. MORGAN. It is not the Gulf of Mexico we are taking care of. It is 5,500 square miles of territory of the United States that is drained by the waters of the Mississippi and its tributaries. In that 5,500 square miles there are 13,500 miles of navigable waters already under improvement by the Government of the United States. There is also the great port of Galveston, which represents practically the great empire State of the Union. There is also either Mobile or Pensacola to the east of it, representing together, I may say, the waters that reach the Chattahoochee River, the dividing line between Georgia and Alabama; and the waters of the Alabama River, which reach both Georgia and Mississippi.

There are two ports provided, not one for Pensacola and one for Mobile, but one for either of the places that the Postmaster-General may consider to be for the best interests of commerce. At New Orleans, of course, there is a port established from which a vessel would sail, and also from Galveston.

So, in providing in the bill, as was announced by the Senator from New Hampshire, liberally for the Gulf of Mexico the provision is for the great West and the great Central States of the American Union, bounded on the east by the Allegheny Mountains and on the west by the Rocky Mountains.

That trade, Mr. President, that commercial power of production, ought to be represented on this bill more liberally by far than it is in the establishment of lines of intercommunication with the isthmian country of America.

When we get down to Panama a difficulty arises at both ends of the canal. The difficulty is that in the treaty called the "Hay-Varilla treaty," as I understand it (perhaps I am in error about it), there is an outside Panama port in each of the harbors of Colon, or Bay of Limon, and Panama, through which vessels entering the canal are bound to pass, and they are Panama ports under that reaty.

There is a provision, however, in the treaty by which a delimitation of ports may take place, and it has been effected to a degree. Governor Davis, while in charge at Panama, made an arrangement with the Government of Panama for the delimitation of two ports lying side by side in each of these bays, one a Panama port and the other a port of the United States.

Secretary Taft, answering certain very urgent objections that were made by the Panama Government that that delimitation had occasioned an opportunity for passing ships into the Zone without their passing through the Panama port, and thereby making certain arrangements of tariff dues, port dues, light dues, and so forth, necessary, entered into what is called a "modus vivendi," that fashionable and modern invention for getting around difficulties in the United States. That modus vivendi makes a provision which, as I read it, in effect is a concession on the part of the Panama Government in favor of the United States, that for all commerce entering into the canal for canal purposes and for the feeding and clothing of canal operatives and hands the Government of the United States shall be considered as the government owning the port of entry, so that it shall have the advantages of an American port, and tariff dues could not be charged against those people in American ports.

So on the other side there was a delimitation of ports, and our port there is called "La Boca," and the other port is called the "Port of Panama;" on the bay of Limon the Panama port is Colon, and the port of the United States is Cristobal, and of course the like conditions would exist in all these four ports under the modus vivendi whenever it becomes operative as a law.

On our part, the Government of the United States, through the powers conferred upon the President in the Spooner Act and in the subsequent amendatory law, has not made a ratification of this agreement entered into by Secretary Taft. On the part of the Panama Government, the arrangement is hanging suspended, subject to ratification by the Congress of that Government, and that Congress is not now in esse; it is not now elected. It will be elected in July; and under that situation we have to skirmish for our privileges in the nature of permission from the Panama Government to the United States Government to permit us to send to the Isthmus to the extent of admitting free of Panama duties whatever we may need down there for the construction of the canal and the supply of the hands.

I propose to put an express declaration in this measure that ships are authorized to leave a Pacific port and go to the port of La Boca on the one side and are authorized to leave a port of the Atlantic and go to the port of Cristobal on the other side, so that this Congress will declare that these two ports are American ports. It makes no difference to us what anybody else may hereafter attempt to declare or refuse to concede, I want to put that proposition in this bill. It is the first time I have had an opportunity to do it, and it is absolutely essential to the construction of the canal and the safeguard of the peace between the two Governments.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I know how important it is to have the amendments printed, so I will not stop to discuss the matter the Senator from Alabama has brought to the attention of the Senate further than to say that in the construction of this bill it was felt it was very liberal, indeed, to the Gulf of Mexico, four out of the seven new lines to be established having their departure from the Gulf of Mexico. The Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] has offered an amendment proposing to establish one more line in one of these provisions, making two lines instead of one, which it has been thought would be accepted. The Senator from Alabama proposes two additional new lines. It is a matter we ought to consider very carefully.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question. As the Senator knows, I am in favor of this part of the bill. As he is adverting to the fact that the Gulf of Mexico has been quite liberally provided for in the bill, I wish to ask the Senator if he thinks that the Atlantic coast has been properly provided for? If I read the bill correctly, there is provision for only one line of steamers on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is wrong about that.

Mr. BACON. Am I incorrect?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is incorrect. The first provision is from a port of the Atlantic coast to Brazil, the second from a port of the Atlantic coast to Uruguay and Argentina, and a third from a port of the Atlantic coast to South Africa. There are three provisions for Atlantic coast ports.

Mr. BACON. I see. I was thinking of South America when I said there was only one, but there are two to South America.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; one to Brazil and one to Uruguay and Argentina.

Mr. BACON. I had overlooked that fact. I knew, of course, there was one to South Africa, but I was under the impression that there was only one to South America. I see now that I was incorrect.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the second amendment that was proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, line 4, after the word "and" and before "the," insert "Port La Boca, on;" so as to read, "and Port La Boca, on the Isthmus of Panama."

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no objection to that, I presume.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will lie on the table.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question.

Mr. MORGAN. Was my amendment accepted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous consent agreement the amendment can not be acted upon now. The amendment will be printed in the reprint which has been ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. I merely understood the Senator from New Hampshire to say he had no objection to it. I understood that to be an acceptance of the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that there is no objection to the amendment on the part of the Senator from New Hampshire. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire. In this arrangement for Gulf ports as now provided in the bill is it expected that New Orleans will be excluded?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator regard New Orleans as a Gulf port? I understand that the Senator from Alabama proposes as an additional port New Orleans, on the idea that New Orleans would not be included in these designated ports unless mentioned by name.

Mr. MORGAN. That is my idea.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if that is his view of the language of the bill as it now stands? I think that is a very important question.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; I want to remove all difficulty in respect to New Orleans, so that it shall not be excluded on the ground that it is not a Gulf port.

Mr. GALLINGER. I had supposed that New Orleans would be considered a Gulf port.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it ought to be mentioned specifically, if there is any question about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is on the Mississippi River, which directly enters the Gulf. However, I will look that matter over very carefully before the amendments are voted on. I quite agree that New Orleans ought to be taken care of. There is no question about that.

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose the Senator from Alabama intended to add only one additional port instead of two if the phraseology now in the bill would include New Orleans.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator intends to make but two lines——

Mr. MORGAN. Three lines from Gulf ports.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understood it was two additional lines.

Mr. MORGAN. The port of Cristobal, which is on the Caribbean side of the canal.

Mr. BACON. I understand from the amendment of the Senator from Alabama that it is the intention to provide not simply that there shall be a certain number of lines from ports on the Gulf coast, but that there shall be different ports—New Orleans and some other port. I want to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to the fact that under the provisions of the bill the two lines which are provided from the Atlantic coast for the South American trade might both be starting from the same point on the Atlantic coast. If the principle is to be adopted in regard to the Gulf coast, it seems to me it ought also to be extended to the Atlantic coast; that where there are more lines than one, there ought to be more ports than one from which the lines should start. The first provision is for a line from a port on the Atlantic coast to Brazil, and the second is for a line from a port on the Atlantic coast to Argentina, but there is nothing in the bill which will prevent both those lines from going from one port.

In regard to the question as to whether New Orleans is a Gulf port, of course the same question would arise as to ports on the Atlantic. I suppose, of course, that New Orleans would be regarded as a Gulf port in the same way that Savannah is regarded as an Atlantic port, although it is 16 miles up the river from the ocean. In the same way Philadelphia would be regarded as an Atlantic port, although it is some distance from that city to the Atlantic Ocean. I do not suppose there would be any objection, if it is so desired, that there should be a similar definite specification as to the Atlantic ports. I do not think, however, that it is necessary. New Orleans would undoubtedly be regarded as a Gulf port, and all the cities on the Atlantic coast would be regarded as Atlantic ports.

But my object in rising was to call attention to the fact that in the case of the Gulf ports it is proposed to be specific, to say that one shall be at New Orleans and that the other shall be elsewhere, whereas, as to the Atlantic ports, where there are several lines provided for, the phraseology is such that each line might be started at the same port, and that doubtless would be at the port of New York. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I did not care to raise that question, and should not have done so but for the fact that the Senator from Alabama introduced an amendment here under the impression that New Orleans was not included in the bill. I had supposed up to that time that it was included.

Mr. BACON. I think the Senator was quite correct—and I call attention to it—in his construction of it. I would suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that possibly the difficulty which occurs to my mind as to the concentration of the benefits of this bill at one port might be met if the phraseology should be so changed as to provide for the touching of these lines of steamers at the different ports along the Atlantic coast—the lines of steamers I now refer to are those that go to the South American ports—because if they started from New York they would necessarily pass near to all the Atlantic ports between New York and South America.

I do not offer any amendment upon that line, but I would suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire, in charge of the bill, that possibly the bill might be amended in that particular to some advantage. There are several important products which are shipped from southern ports to South America, and it would be a very great hardship if they had to be sent first to New York and then shipped from there south to South America. If we are to enter upon this business of the development of this trade, we ought to have regard to the fact of the convenience of shippers—those who are to be engaged in the trade that is to be developed—and if it is not practicable to provide specifically for separate lines to different ports, it seems to me to be entirely practicable and desirable that there should be a provision in this bill that these lines of steamers—there will be probably several lines of steamers which will doubtless start from New York—should stop or touch at the various ports, in order that they might all have the advantage of the lines of communication which would be thus opened and developed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it occurred to the framers of this bill that there was not only a difficulty, but a danger in attempting to name specific ports. That would at once arouse antagonism; and it was a grave question whether or not this was a feasible thing to do. However, we can look that over later on.

Mr. President, I want to occupy a little of the time of the Senate this morning in further discussion of the bill. First, I want to put in the RECORD, without reading, a resolution adopted by the New York senate and assembly a couple of days ago, which indorses not only the purpose of this bill, but the bill in terms. It passed the senate of the State of New York unanimously and passed the assembly by a vote of 95 to 16. It is gratifying to me to observe that more Democrats voted for the bill than voted against it in the assembly of New York.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire will be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The resolution referred to is as follows:

[State of New York. No. 14. In assembly. Calendar of bills. Introduced by Mr. Hill.]

Monday, February 12, 1906.

A concurrent resolution of the legislature of the State of New York, addressed to the United States Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States from the State of New York, in relation to American shipping in the foreign trade by sea.

Whereas our merchant marine engaged in the foreign trade, which in 1810 carried 90 per cent of our foreign commerce and to-day carries but 10 per cent thereof, is now only one-third as large as it was in the zenith of its development in 1860; and

Whereas an American merchant marine, with trained and experienced shipmasters, officers, and seamen, sailing under the flag of the United States is essential to our national defense as an auxiliary to the Navy in time of need; and

Whereas upon the recommendation of President Roosevelt a Commission, consisting of five Senators and five Representatives in Congress, was appointed to investigate this subject, and public hearings were held in most of the leading Atlantic, Gulf, Lake, and Pacific ports of the United States, resulting in a report, accompanied by a bill to carry into effect the recommendation of the Commission, which measure is now pending in the Congress of the United States and is designed to upbuild and rehabilitate our shipping in the foreign trade: Therefore, be it

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That the legislature of the State of New York commends the work, the report, and the bill of the Congressional Merchant Marine Commission as worthy of the support of the Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States from the State of New York; be it further

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of New York.

[Assembly, No. 14. Introduced by Mr. Hill.]

A concurrent resolution of the legislature of the State of New York, addressed to the United States Senators and Representatives in Congress of the United States from the State of New York, in relation to pilots and coastwise sailing vessels engaged in domestic commerce.

Whereas the State of New York is deeply concerned in all matters affecting its commerce and in the welfare and prosperity of its citizens engaged in transportation, as is shown in its maintenance of a magnificent system of canals, now under enlargement, and in the appointment of commissions to inquire into the cause of the decline and the means for the revival of its commerce; and

Whereas sailing vessels in our coast trade (many of which are owned in this State) are at present subject to an unjust and onerous burden in being compelled to employ State pilots in the ports of the States south of the Capes of Virginia, whether the services of such pilots be required or not, a compulsion from which steam vessels have been exempt by an act of Congress approved on February 28, 1871, nearly thirty-five years ago; and

Whereas bills are now pending in each branch of Congress, to wit, Senate bill No. 30 and House bill No. 5281, providing for the exemption of sailing vessels in the coasting trade from the compulsory employment of State pilots when such vessels are commanded by licensed United States pilots or when they are in tow of tugboats that are commanded by licensed United States pilots: Therefore, be it

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That is is the sense of the legislature of the State of New York that American sailing vessels in the coasting trade should be exempt from the compulsory employment of State pilots as American steam vessels have been: And, therefore, be it further

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That the Senators and Representatives from the State of New York be, and they hereby are, respectfully requested to support and advocate the enactment of such measures in Congress providing for such exemption as being conducive to the increase of our commerce and the greater prosperity of our citizens.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, I want to very briefly call attention to the letter which the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] had placed in the RECORD yesterday from a shipper in the city of Galveston. The Senate will remember that letter. Its author, a Mr. Mosle, was before the Merchant Marine Commission, the Commission having held a session in the city of Galveston. He was asked some questions by the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY]. I was not present at that hearing.

Senator MALLORY. What is your occupation?

Mr. MOSLE. I am in the shipping business. As far as I know there is only one vessel from Galveston under the American flag that is going offshore, and that is the John Francis.

Just think of it! That great port of Galveston, on which we have spent millions and millions of dollars in making it suitable for navigation, has just one American ship going out of the port engaged in the foreign trade, and that is a schooner—the John Francis. Mr. Mosle made this further observation:

I, contrary to Colonel Gresham, have a distinct view on this subject. I have followed this matter for a couple of years. I followed Senator FRYE'S bill, and I have read it carefully. I am at it as a means of earning a living and not as a pastime, and I am fully convinced that any subsidy will be a failure, and absolutely convinced that we will not have any merchant marine unless we have free trade, free ships, and, what is more than free ships—free crews. I should like to see that condition.

Senator MALLORY. What do you mean by "free crews?"

Mr. MOSLE. By "free crews" I mean the privilege of employing the best men we can get hold of, regardless of nationality.

Then he admits that that can not be done under our present law. He further says:

The supply of men to man ships consists of foreigners to a very large extent, and the difference in the wages, although this may seem a matter of surprise to you, but I have noticed it repeatedly, does not seem a sufficient inducement to get men on the American ships; and I take it, crew for crew, the foreign crew is better than the American crew, although getting lower wages in a competitive port.

That, of course, is ridiculous.

Mr. President, this gentleman who, as I understand, represents a foreign steamship company at Galveston, advocates free ships, free crews, and free trade, and yet he has the audacity to write a letter to the Senate of the United States, when it is considering a bill for the rehabilitation of the American merchant marine, protesting against the passage of the bill. I feel sure that he does not represent the opinion of the people in his part of the country.

For instance, I have here resolutions adopted by the Brunswick, Ga., Board of Trade on January 4, 1906, which I will read:

Whereas, upon the recommendation of the President, a Commission was appointed by the last Congress, which thoroughly investigated the condition of American shipping, said Commission presenting a report, together with a bill to carry into effect its recommendations; and

Whereas the Commission found that 9 per cent of our ocean carrying is done by American vessels, 91 per cent being carried by the subsidized and bountied shipping of other countries, that annually about $200,000,000 are being paid to foreign ships, and this condition the Commission's bill would so remedy as to give to American ships a much larger and fairer share of our deep-sea carrying; and

Whereas said Commission has framed a bill now pending before Congress, after full hearings in all parts of the country, the entire Commission agreeing, it is understood, that some legislation is not only desirable but necessary for the revival of our merchant marine, differing only as to methods; and

Whereas the commerce of the United States with the West Indies, Central and South America is steadily increasing, is nearest the southern ports, increasing with Cuba in the past seven years from $28,000,000 to $134,000,000, with Porto Rico from less than $4,000,000 to over $28,000,000—destined, with reasonable aid to our merchant marine, to increase with South and Central America in equally wonderful proportions and equally important to this port and other ports on the South Atlantic coast with Gulf ports:

Resolved, That this board earnestly appeals to Congress to amend Senate bill 529, or any like measure which may be passed, in the sixth section thereof in the first to eighth paragraphs, inclusive, so as to open the ocean mail service therein provided for to all Atlantic and all Gulf ports.

Resolved, That this board earnestly appreciates and commands the patriotic work of the Commission, deems this a question above party, and appeals to the Congress to pass some wise measure for the revival of our merchant marine in American ships, built in American shipyards of American materials, thus paving the way for supremacy in this only field of effort in which the United States is exceeded by other nations, and earnestly hopes our Senators and Representatives in Congress will see their way to support such a measure already appealed for by the legislature of Georgia, and of vital importance, as this board believes, to every citizen of the State, and wiping out the humiliation of the leading nation in commerce carrying 91 per cent of its trade in foreign ships under foreign flags.

Resolved, That a properly certified copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the Senate, Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

By order of the board.

J. STOVALL SMITH, President.

Attest:

C. D. OGG, Secretary.

Adopted unanimously.

I will also read resolutions adopted by the New Orleans Board of Trade, as follows:

Resolutions of the New Orleans Board of Trade, December 13, 1905.

Whereas upon the recommendation of President Roosevelt a Commission was appointed by the last Congress which thoroughly investigated the condition of American shipping, said Commission presenting a report, together with a bill, to carry into effect its recommendations; and

Whereas the Commission found that 9 per cent of our ocean carrying is done by American vessels, 91 per cent being carried by the subsidized and bountied shipping of other countries; that annually $200,000,000 are being paid to foreign ships, and this condition the Commission's bill would so remedy as to give to American ships a much larger and fairer share of our deep-sea carrying; and

Whereas the Commission's bill conforms in its provisions to the practices of other nations in dealing with their merchant shipping, and is so designed not only to give our shipowners a greater share of our foreign carrying, but to create a demand for American materials and American labor in shipbuilding as well as afford employment afloat for American shipmasters, officers, and seamen, the ships and men being essential to the national defense for auxiliary naval purposes in time of trouble: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the New Orleans Board of Trade, recognizing the pressing importance of an American mercantile marine, warmly commends the work of the Congressional Merchant Marine Commission, and expresses the earnest hope that its bill will receive the support of Louisiana's Senators and Representatives in Congress, to the end that we shall have an effective and enduring mercantile marine commensurate with our position as a great world power; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to the members of the Louisiana delegation in Congress.

I have similar resolutions from the Commercial Club of Mobile, the Chamber of Commerce of Pensacola, and the Board of Trade of Brunswick, Ga., showing that the gentleman who wrote that very remarkable letter which was read yesterday does not represent the business interests of the section of country from which he writes.

Mr. President, if the suggestions made by that gentleman should be carried into effect, what condition would we be in? He is in favor of free trade, free ships, and free crews. We would have a ship built in Great Britain, Germany, France, or Norway, manned by officers and seamen of foreign nationality, the only thing American about it being the flag; and probably this gentleman would have that flag manufactured in Great Britain or Germany, because they can make flags much cheaper than we can in the United States. That is the condition in which we should be in that great port of the United States, upon which Congress has spent a great many millions of dollars and which is without American shipping; and that would be his cure for the condition of things that exists to-day, where in that great southern port there is just one ship carrying the American flag in the foreign trade, and that a schooner.

I wish to say a few words in reference to the naval-reserve feature of the bill, which was discussed yesterday at considerable length. I think that I stated definitely enough yesterday the origin of the present provision. The Merchant Marine Commission had agreed upon a provision that they thought was wise, but upon reconsideration they were led to think that the provision of the naval board, which was amended by increasing the retainer to the officers and the men to a considerable extent, was perhaps a more workable scheme than the one the Commission had recommended.

In advising the appointment of a commission to study this question the President of the United States, among other recommendations, specifically suggested that the question of a naval reserve ought to be taken into consideration. The Commission was appointed upon that recommendation of the President after the passage of the law, and they could not well, even if they had been disposed to do so, overlook that part of the Presidential message, and they accordingly took that into consideration in connection with other matters.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] yesterday had a little colloquy with me, and perhaps with other Senators, as to the possibility of having this naval reserve mixed on ships, and while I said that my information led me to believe that the British Government had exactly that plan in operation, the Senator from Georgia stated that he had received information to the contrary; that they were separated entirely. I have made some further inquiries about it from a source I think entitled to the greatest possible credence, and I find, at least my information leads me to believe, that the British Government has mixed crews of naval-reserve men and others in many of her ships. In some instances they require one-fourth to be naval-reserve men, and in the Cunard contract they require one-half to be naval reserves. So it does seem to me that what I suggested in regard to this matter, so far as the British plan was concerned, is probably correct.

Mr. BACON. I will state to the Senator that while, of course, it would not be proper for me to give the name of the gentleman who gave me that information, he is a Member of the House of Representatives. He stated to me that he had made a very careful study of the matter, and that that was a fact, as stated by him to me, about which he could not be mistaken. That is the source of my information and the extent of it. I will state further to the Senator that the Member of the House who gave me that information is one who belongs to the same political party as does the Senator himself——

Mr. GALLINGER. He must be a good man, then.

Mr. BACON. And not an opponent of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think he is wrong about it. That is my impression, but I do not know that that is a matter that ought to take up much of our time in this discussion. I have reason to believe that the Navy Department would not have recommended a scheme that is not workable, and that they have examined into it very carefully and are of opinion that, if it is incorporated into law, there will be no difficulty in enforcing it.

Now, Mr. President, in reference to some protests that have been presented here in opposition to this naval-reserve feature, I noticed in the RECORD that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] presented a letter from Mr. Samuel Gompers, who, after admitting that he did not know much about it, stated that he was of the opinion that it would not be to the advantage of the seamen if this provision should be incorporated into law. I have here the action of the Association of Masters and Pilots of Steam Vessels of the United States. Every one of those men is an American, and every one of those men has won merited promotion from the forecastle up to the position he now occupies. They have gone through the different grades of the service to that point. I will ask the Secretary to read the resolutions adopted by that organization, which ought to have a good deal of weight with the Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF MASTERS AND PILOTS OF STEAM VESSELS.

January, 1905.

Whereas American ships now convey only 10 per cent of the imports and exports of the United States, while 90 per cent are conveyed in foreign ships, thus building up at the expense of the American people the naval reserve of foreign nations; and

Whereas this condition of affairs deprives American officers and seamen of employment in ocean trade, and thus prevents the development of an adequate naval reserve in our own country: Therefore,

Resolved, That the American Association of Masters and Pilots of Steam Vessels, realizing the need of American deep-sea shipping and the value of a strong merchant fleet to the nation in peace or war, heartily commends the work of the Merchant Marine Commission, authorized by Congress on the recommendation of the President, and urges the prompt enactment of Senate bill 6291, reported by the Commission, "to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage."

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senator from New Hampshire, I should like to have inserted in the RECORD an extract from the New York Journal of Commerce of February 7, which I will ask the Secretary to read, bearing upon the present bill, and showing the activity of the Japanese in the particular line of effort we are now contemplating.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW JAPANESE LINE—FIRST VESSEL FROM SOUTH AMERICAN PORTS REACHES IQUIQUE.

SANTIAGO, CHILE, February 6, 1906.

There arrived at Iquique to-day the first vessel of the new steamship line between Japan and South American ports. The steamer will sail thence to Valparaiso. Great expectations are entertained of profit to Chile in the export of nitrates to Japan by this line.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have only one further observation to make in reference to the naval-reserve feature of the bill, and that is in reply to the contention of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] that the payment of these retainers would result in the lowering of seamen's wages. That, Mr. President, it seems to me, is utterly without warrant. It would be quite impossible for the men who operate ships to take advantage of any retainer that the Government of the United States gave to these men, under conditions that they should serve the Government in time of need, to reduce their wages. It seems to me that it will, if it does anything in that line, tend to increase their wages. It establishes a higher standard and will certainly do in this country what it has done in Great Britain; that is, to improve the seafaring class, increasing the respect that they will have for themselves and the respect felt for them by their fellow-countrymen. This class in Great Britain are looked upon, not necessarily as a favored class, but as a class of seafaring men who may be called a "picked class," and instead of lowering their wages or their standing or their respect, it has tended to increase both their standing and their respect, and I think, to some extent, their wages.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] yesterday——

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. What does the Senator mean by "increasing their standing and respect?"

Mr. GALLINGER. Simply as I said——

Mr. SPOONER. Does it mean greater dignity?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think they are looked upon as a class of men who have had instruction that puts them a little above the ordinary seamen.

Mr. SPOONER. And they will stand on the ship, a relatively small number of them, both in the same grade, as receiving more pay and being entitled to greater consideration. Is that the theory?

Mr. GALLINGER. I see no reason why that should be so.

Mr. SPOONER. Would not that naturally be so?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think not.

Mr. SPOONER. That had not occurred to me.

Mr. GALLINGER. They will stand on the ship under the direction of the officers of the ship, and, of course, they would observe the rules and regulations of the ship, and be compelled to do so. They might have in their inner consciousness a feeling that perhaps they were a little superior to somebody else, but in the performance of their duties I see no danger in that direction at all, and I do not think the Senator can.

Mr. SPOONER. A fellow who has that in his inner consciousness generally makes it manifest by his outward manner.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a pretty good idea for men to have that inner consciousness, especially if they have earned it.

Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] suggested yesterday that he was in doubt as to whether or not there was any need of subventions to ships sailing on the Caribbean Sea. As I understood the Senator, he did not commit himself fully to that view, but he made that suggestion. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the figures of our carrying trade with Cuba and the West India islands. Take our carrying trade with Cuba, and it is very illuminating. For some reason or other—I do not know what—there has been a tremendous decline in the percentage of the trade that we carry in American ships. I have here a table of our carrying trade with Cuba from 1895 to 1904. It shows the imports and exports carried in American and in foreign vessels. It is as follows:

OUR CARRYING TRADE WITH CUBA.

Imports into and exports from the United States in its trade with Cuba during the years ending June 30, 1895 to 1904.

Year ending June 30—	Imports, vessels brought in.		Exports, vessels carried in.		Total vessels carried in.		Per cent American.

Imports brought in cars, etc., are as follows: 1895, $917; 1900, $1,279; 1901, $786; 1902, $1,087; 1903, $129,428; 1904, $608.

Exports carried in cars, etc., are as follows: 1900, $1,100; 1903, $796; 1904, $4,340.

J. N. WHITNEY,
Acting Chief of Bureau.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR,
BUREAU OF STATISTICS, May 9, 1905.

So that while ten years ago we carried in American ships almost as much of the imports from Cuba to the United States as was carried in foreign ships, in 1904 we carried considerably less than one-half—only 35 per cent. While the proportion of our exports to Cuba carried in American ships averages annually higher than the proportion of our imports, it will be seen that the proportion of our imports from Cuba carried in American ships in 1904 amounted to only 35 per cent.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish the Senator would give the totals of each of those years.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will be found in the table that I will insert in the RECORD.

Mr. ALLISON. It appears to me, from the reading of the statement by the Senator, that that can not include all the commerce between Cuba and the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. It does absolutely include it all. Last year there were $22,000,000 of imports from Cuba carried in American vessels and $54,000,000 in foreign vessels; of the exports $14,000,000 were carried in American vessels and $13,000,000 in foreign vessels.

Mr. President, the trade with the West Indies, exclusive of Cuba, is likewise illuminating. For the year ended June 30, 1904, there were carried in American vessels $6,284,000 worth and in foreign vessels $23,686,000. So to the West Indies, exclusive of Cuba, we carried only 20 per cent in American vessels.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], in his very careful analysis of the bill—and I am glad that he studied it and gave to us who are trying to represent the necessity for this legislation the aid of his important counsel—made an observation that if we gave a subvention to the cargo steamers they would necessarily compete with the mail steamers, and in that way it would do more harm than good.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will permit me, I did not say "necessarily." I would not venture a statement of so strong a character.

Mr. GALLINGER. Perhaps I ought to have used the word "possibly" instead of "necessarily."

Mr. ALLISON. It occurred to me that we were subsidizing two classes of ships, and that they would naturally compete with each other.

Mr. GALLINGER. I very likely did not use the proper phrase. I got the impression that the Senator took that position. I have looked that matter up a little since last evening, and I find this to be true.

It is the almost unvarying practice of regular steamship lines all over the world to run a certain number of cargo ships in connection with their regular mail liners.

These cargo ships are essential to the completeness of a line of ocean transportation. On the land the railroad has its express cars and its fast freight trains, corresponding to the regular mail liners on the sea; and besides, the railroad has its slow freight trains for coal, bricks, ore, etc., corresponding to the cargo steamers.

The mail liner first makes trade and then as its volume grows the bulkier and cheaper commodities are turned over to the cargo steamers.

Thus the Ward Line, the best developed American example in ocean trade, has four or five fast steamers carrying mails, passengers, and freight from New York to Cuba and Mexico. But this line also employs several vessels with small passenger capacity, or none at all, but great cargo capacity of relatively slow speed, running in connection with the mail liners, for the bulkier commodities and for service to minor ports.

The Red "D" line to Venezuela, receiving mail subsidy under the law of 1891, has three or four mail liners and one cargo steamer employed chiefly in Caribbean waters.

The British Canadian Pacific line to China has three mail subsidized steamers and two slower cargo vessels.

The American mail lines to South America and the Orient would have none but mail ships at first, but as their trade developed would do as the Ward line and foreign companies have done, and utilize slower cargo vessels for a large part of their traffic.

If cargo subventions are given by the United States, these mail lines will build American cargo steamers; otherwise they will utilize foreign steamers, and the building and operation of these cargo ships will be lost to this country.

There are now almost no American cargo vessels in our foreign trade, except the sail vessels, and until the mail lines become well established it is not likely that many cargo steamers will be constructed here.

These cargo vessels do not compete sharply or disastrously with, but rather supplement, the mail liners of the same service—any more than the slow freight trains of the railroad system necessarily injure the faster freight trains or express-car service.

Both mail liners and cargo vessels are essential to the most satisfactory expansion of a country's commerce.

The cargo subventions of the present bill, moderate in amount and leaving something to American economy and enterprise, are not large enough to induce the overbuilding of these vessels.

It is my judgment, after some study of this question, that the pending bill would be very incomplete if the motion which the Senator from Georgia has given notice he will make should prevail, to strike out the provision for a subvention to cargo steamers. I do not think there is any danger of our trade being overburdened with that class of ships, but I do believe that they are essential to a complete system designed to expand American trade and to build up the American merchant marine.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say this morning. I simply wanted to answer with as much brevity as possible some of the objections made to the bill yesterday; and the matter is now open to other Senators.

Mr. FULTON. I offer an amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 10, page 14, after the word "from," strike out the words "a port" and insert the words "each of two ports, namely, Puget Sound and the Columbia River;" and in line 10, page 14, after the word "the," to insert the word "North."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of discussing this bill, but to make a suggestion in response to a suggestion made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who has it in charge.

On Monday I received from a citizen of Galveston, Mr. H. Mosle, an argument, in the form of a letter, against certain provisions of the bill under consideration. On yesterday, there being a lull in the debate and desiring to that extent to inform the Senate as well as to continue the proceeding without unseemly interruption, I suggested that the letter be printed in the RECORD, so that Senators this morning might read and have the benefit of the suggestions which it contains. At the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] it was read, and of course appears in the RECORD. The Senator from New Hampshire, it seems to me, has referred to this small incident rather fretfully, characterizing the act on the part of Mr. Mosle as one of audacity, that being the word employed.

Mr. President, my acquaintance with this gentleman it is true is slight, but he is a very intelligent man and a good citizen. His letter is couched in respectful language, and he states a number of facts which are entitled to consideration. So far as the publication of the letter is concerned, the gentleman had no concern with it at all, and whatever there may be to blame respecting that feature of it I take upon myself.

I simply rose, Mr. President, to bear testimony to the character and intelligence of this gentleman and to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that it would probably be better to answer his statements and his arguments than to characterize the writing of a letter to a Senator, which was published in the RECORD, as an act of audacity on the part of a resident of a State.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I certainly have no disposition to get into an unpleasant controversy with my friend the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. He is one of the last Senators in this body with whom I would seek a controversy on any subject, because of my cordial relations with him. Perhaps I ought not to have used the word "audacity," but it seemed to me not a very strong word in view of the fact that this man of foreign birth, representing a foreign steamship company, had given to the Commission at a time when we are trying to build up this languishing industry his views in favor of free ships, free trade, and free crews, and then wrote a letter to us on the subject. I thought he had expressed his views very plainly and bluntly and without qualification in the testimony which he gave before the Commission.

He had a right to send the letter here. The Senator from Texas had the undoubted right to have it read and printed, and it will go for whatever it is worth. I have no disposition to be offensive either to the Senator or his constituents, and if the word "audacity" ought not to have been used, some other word can be substituted in the minds of Senators.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, it is hardly necessary for me to say that in the few remarks I made a few moments ago I had no desire to provoke a personal controversy, or a controversy of any kind, with the Senator from New Hampshire. I simply wanted to bear testimony to the character of the writer of the letter as a good citizen and a man of intelligence.

I desire to add, while I am on the floor, that there is a great deal in the letter besides the suggestion of free ships and free crews. There is, as I remember, a suggestion which, so far as I have been able to ascertain, has not yet been met in the debate—that there is an absolutely useless waste of public money with reference to some of the features of the bill, to characterize it by no severer language. To that feature of the bill particularly this letter is directed, and so far as I have heard there has been nothing said here to meet the suggestions made by the writer of the letter.

Mr. McLAURIN. If it is in order to submit amendments, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That no part of the subsidy by this act provided for shall be paid to any Senator or Representative in Congress or member of the executive or judiciary department; or to any member of the family of any such Senator, Representative, member of the executive or judiciary department; or to any corporation of which such Senator, Representative, member of the executive or judiciary department, or member of the family of such Senator, Representative, member of the executive or judiciary department shall own or shall have owned, in his or her or any other name, any of the stock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will lie on the table.

Mr. SPOONER. In section 1, beginning in line 11, page 5, I move to strike out all after the word "fisheries."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 11, after the word "fisheries," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the section, as follows:

Each officer, petty officer, or man of the naval reserve thus enrolled who has not served for six months of the preceding year on vessels of the United States in the merchant marine or in the deep-sea fisheries, but has complied with the other prescribed requirements for enrollment in the naval reserve, shall receive one-half the annual retainer as enumerated above.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I do that for this reason: The language employed in this section before the clause which I move to eliminate from the bill grades the officers in the naval service and the men, and provides for pay of each grade—a hundred and ten dollars, ninety, eighty dollars, seventy dollars, sixty dollars, forty-eight dollars, forty dollars, thirty-six dollars, thirty dollars, twenty-four dollars a year—when they shall have during the year served six months in the merchant marine or the deep-sea fisheries.

I have not the slightest desire to disturb that portion of the section. The provision which my amendment would eliminate is one which proposes to pay out of the Treasury one-half each year of that annual "retainer," graded as I have indicated, to men without requiring them to have served during the year one hour on the sea, either in the merchant marine or in the deep-sea fisheries.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] agreed yesterday—and of course it is indisputable—that that is the effect of the language employed, and added that that was the intention of the proposition, which comes not from the Commission that investigated the subject and is responsible for this bill, but from the Navy Department, and is intended to apply—that is the only possible justification I have heard for it—to those men who have served in the Navy and have left the Navy. It is an offer of reward, not for going to sea, not for serving on a ship, but for an agreement to hold one's self liable, on the command of the President, at any time during four years, to serve in defense of the Government, if called upon. It is an unnecessary appeal, through the dollar in the Treasury, to the patriotism of men who have once served under the flag and who, it is assumed, would not, if occasion called for it, return to its defense and give the Government the benefit of their skill and experience unless in the meantime they have had from the Treasury this donation of money which they have not earned.

With that stricken from the bill all sailors who join the naval reserve, and who have served during the year six months at sea, will receive this money. That is all that should be in the bill on that subject, and I hope the Senator from New Hampshire, who said yesterday he was not at all insistent upon the provision to which my motion is addressed, will see his way clear to eliminate it.

There is another provision in the bill to which I desire to offer an amendment. That is the third subdivision on page 8. This undoubtedly will be controverted, although I hope not.

Third. That upon each departure of said vessel from the United States at least one-sixth of the crew shall be citizens of the United States, or men who have declared their intention to become citizens, and of the deck force, excluding licensed officers, at least one-half shall be able seamen, who are hereby defined to be men who have had two years or more experience at sea on deck.

So far as I know there is no definition or provision in the statutes as to the number of able seamen required to constitute the complement of seamen on a ship. If I am mistaken the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], certainly the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] who sits before me, will so advise me. Perhaps from the silence of the Senator from Maine I may assume that I am right. There is a provision, section 4463, which declares that—

No steamer carrying passengers shall depart from any port unless she shall have in her service a full complement of licensed officers and full crew, sufficient at all times to manage the vessel, including the proper number of watchmen. But if any such vessel, on her voyage, is deprived of the services of any licensed officer, without the consent, fault, or collusion of the master, owner, or any person interested in the vessel, the deficiency may be temporarily supplied until others licensed can be obtained.

That, as a statutory regulation concerning the manning of a vessel, it seems to me, unless there is some technical learning about it with which I am not familiar, is utterly inconsequential.

There shall be, the statute says, a full complement of licensed officers and a full crew. What constitutes a full crew? Who determines that? Is it determined by the Commissioner of Navigation or are there rules to determine it?

Mr. FRYE. It is determined by the inspectors. No ship sails without the inspector having given a certificate that there has been a compliance with the law.

Mr. SPOONER. The inspector determines how many men are necessary to constitute a complement?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir; and their qualifications and character.

Mr. SPOONER. They determine whether the men are capable?

Mr. FRYE. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator was quite correct yesterday, as I look at the statute, in his statement that the word "crew" is used in generic sense. In chapter 7, Revised Statutes, relating to the offenses and punishments committed by and inflicted upon sailors, section 4612:

In the construction of this title—

"Title"—it is not simply the chapter, but the title covering the whole subject—

In the construction of this title, every person having the command of any vessel belonging to any citizen of the United States shall be deemed to be "master" thereof; and every person (apprentices excepted) who shall be employed or engaged to serve in any capacity on board the same shall be deemed and taken to be a "seaman;" and the term "vessel" shall be understood to comprehend every description of vessel navigating on any sea or channel, lake, or river to which the provisions of this title may be applicable, and the term "owner" shall be taken and understood to comprehend all the several persons, if more than one, to whom the vessel shall belong.

So if only the word "crew" is used as applied to a steamship it includes, as the Senator, I think on further reflection, stated yesterday, the waiters, the department of the stewards, the stokers, and all of the men engaged in any capacity perhaps below the master on the ship.

So far as I am able to discover, in this bill is to be found for the first time an attempt by Congress to draw the line between the waiters, the steward's department, those who in time of danger need help more than they are able to afford it, and the real sailors or navigating force on the ship, who in the event of accident, the destruction of the ship, the necessity to leave it and use the boats, are the men upon whom reliance must be placed, and almost solely upon whom, with the officers, reliance must be placed for lowering the boats, helping the passengers into the boats, and managing the boats so as to preserve, as far as possible, the lives of those who have committed their fate to that ship upon the sea.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. The inspector is obliged to pass upon all that. He is obliged to find a sufficient number of seamen on board the ship before she sails to steer, to navigate, to handle the boat, to take care of the sails, and all that sort of thing. That is a part of his duty, and he has to do it before any vessel sails.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; but there are some horrible evidences of the fact that that provision of the statute has sometimes not availed to the protection of human life. There may be cases of which we shall never know.

Mr. FRYE. Only one.

Mr. SPOONER. More than one. In England there were some, and in this country there have been more than one; and it ought not to be left entirely to inspectors. For its effect upon owners, upon the question of ultimate liability, for the safety of crew and passengers, there ought to be by this time some statutory rule, first, as to the manning of ships, and, second, as to the definition of what constitutes an able seaman or what should constitute the navigating force, using the words which were used in an amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire this morning. It says here:

At least one-sixth of the crew shall be citizens of the United States or men who have declared their intention to become citizens.

That means one-sixth of all employed in any capacity on the ship. It is quite immaterial as to those who wait upon you at the table, a very large force on the ship, except for furnishing employment to citizens of the United States; the important thing is as to the navigating force on deck.

Mr. GALLINGER rose.

Mr. SPOONER. I will listen to the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes. I have no objection to that requirement.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rose simply to say that, as I recollect, the phraseology in that clause was copied after a similar phraseology used in other shipping bills, except that this bill gives a definition requiring two years' service. The definition may be imperfect, but I think it greatly strengthens the bill in respect to the quality of the men.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator did not ask Furuseth?

Mr. GALLINGER. No.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Maine says he did not ask Furuseth. I know Mr. Furuseth. So does the Senator. I have found Mr. Furuseth to be a man of very large intelligence, a man who understands the sea, a man who has spent his whole life nearly upon it.

Mr. FRYE. He has been twenty years in Washington, I guess.

Mr. SPOONER. He has spent practically a large part of his life upon the sea. He became early, before he had reached the years of manhood, a sailor. He is a Scandinavian, who has served in almost every position, except perhaps that of an officer on the ship, and who has sailed upon every known sea except the Mediterranean. He has been in Washington. What for? To represent the interest of the sailors, his class, in the industry of the world. Is that a reproach to him? There is not an industry or a craft in this country or any other which is not organized for the protection and for advancing the interests of its members.

It is not enough, or it ought not to be enough, to condemn a proposition in the Senate of the United States to say that it emanates from one who is here as the delegate of a class of men to be affected by it.

Every great interest in the United States has at times its agents here in Washington, more or less listened to, permitted to present properly in one way and another the interests which they are here to represent.

Whether this proposition or a proposition should be embodied in law, Mr. President, depends not upon the source whence it comes, but upon the merit of the proposition itself. In building up a merchant marine by bounties out of the Treasury raised through taxation throughout the whole country, to encourage the construction of ships, the investment of money in shipyards, why not give some attention to the interest of the men who are to man the ships?

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I, without intending to do it, provoked this oratory of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. Not oratory.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that Mr. Furuseth has been known to me a good many more years than he has to the Senator, and that he has always had a hearing before the Committee on Commerce, and a full and fair hearing, on every proposition that he has made. Many of his propositions have been accepted and made into law. I have nothing against Mr. Furuseth at all, except that now certainly he is no sailor and has not been for quite a number of years. He represents the Sailors' Union on the Pacific coast. That union now controls very largely the sailors on the Pacific coast.

Mr. SPOONER. I presented yesterday a series of resolutions from the sailors of the Great Lakes, from Chicago, in which they took the same view precisely of this compulsory provision as to the employment of naval-reserve men on ships that Mr. Furuseth takes, representing the Sailors' Union on the Pacific coast. If it was proper to hear Mr. Furuseth as the representative of the sailors before the Committee on Commerce, if any of his propositions be found to be reasonable, of course I am not subject to criticism or censure that I have permitted him to talk with me. I reserve to myself the right to obtain information upon matters concerning which I am to legislate from any source, and whatever I urge upon the Senate I urge upon the Senate not because some man has told me this or that, but because upon reflection I think the proposition is a reasonable one.

Why should not the Senate of the United States and the Congress of the United States take peculiar care that there shall be on every steamship which sails under our flag out of a port of the United States a complement of sailors competent by experience on the sea to meet the exigencies which so often confront a ship and which so often destroy the ship and its cargo, human and freight?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SPOONER. I will yield, but I have not presented what I wanted to say.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. No; if the Senator wants to ask me a question, I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not want to ask a question. I simply wanted to repeat what I think the Senator did not catch when he became interested in the Furuseth incident, that those of us who constructed this bill had an impression that the requirement of two years at sea, making that service the definition of an able seaman, improved the bill, and would give the ships a better quality of men.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course, Mr. President, but it is not a careful definition.

Mr. GALLINGER. No.

Mr. SPOONER. It is not such a definition as the British commission which dealt with this great subject of manning ships saw fit to prescribe. They thought there ought to be some limit as to age; they thought that a boy of 18 or under who had served at sea on deck—under this proposed statute a service on deck at sea makes a seaman; he might have served in the cabin of a steamship—should not be regarded as an able seaman.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, on that point, if the Senator can present a better definition I think we would be glad to have it.

Mr. SPOONER. That is just what I am trying to do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am glad the Senator is making that effort.

Mr. SPOONER. I am giving the reason why I think this is inadequate.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I want to say a single word concerning Mr. Furuseth.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Commission listened to Mr. Furuseth in San Francisco very attentively. In the hearings he occupies from page 1212 to page 1277, 65 pages, and scattered through the testimony there are a great many places where Mr. Furuseth appears.

Not only that, but the Commission treated Mr. Furuseth with so much consideration that a portion of the Commission visited a ship in his company and inspected it. But the Senator will agree with me, I feel sure, that this is not the bill to correct all the evils which may exist in reference to seamen on ships.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Committee on Commerce is charged with that duty, and, as I said, I think the Senator will agree with me that this is not the proper bill for legislation of that kind.

Mr. SPOONER. Undoubtedly there are grievances, perhaps defects, in the law which need not be corrected in this legislation, but here is one matter concerning which the sailors of the United States were heard by the Commission, and which the Commission has attempted to deal with, a provision as to which is found in this bill. Two years ago——

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to say to the Senator that in using the words "deck force" I confess I was misled.

Mr. SPOONER. I know it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was misled by the use of that term. I did not think it included the waiters and that class of people.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course. I did not know that until my friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE] informed me yesterday. There is more or less—rather more than less—technicality, of course, in the calling. The Senator has drawn his bill and conducted the bill up to this moment in the Senate with superb ability and in a manner to challenge the admiration and respect of every member of this body and everyone who takes cognizance of it outside of this body. We all want to do what is right about it. If any proposition I make is, because of lack of knowledge, improper to be adopted, it is only needful to show me wherein I am wrong. In the last Congress I offered this amendment to the bill, which was in charge of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], as I recollect it, and it was adopted by the Senate:

Provided, That except in the case of steamers navigating rivers exclusively at least 75 per cent of the navigating crew—

That does not mean this great mass of men on the ocean liner, who are not obliged to know anything about navigation, who are not obliged to have ever served at sea on a sailing ship or to be familiar, except in a very limited way, with the sea—at least 75 per cent of the navigating crew, exclusive of licensed officers, shall be individually effective hands.

That is the navigating force. On the St. Paul, which is a great ship, there is a crew of 377 men all told; 36 constitute the navigating crew or are supposed to be able seamen. I am told that on the Morro Castle there is a crew of about 120 men all told. Sixteen of these are rated as able seamen.

I am not dealing with the mass of stokers and the men who are employed in the cabins, but I am dealing with the men in whose hands in danger lies the safety of the ship and the men, women, and children on the ship. As to those people, Congress can not manifest too careful solicitude. This proportion may be too large, but it is a large proportion of a small force on a ship, and it is important to the owner as to the safety of his property; it is important to those interested in the cargo; it is important to those who sail on the ship, passengers and crew, that in this chosen number of men—the last reliance in time of peril and the best reliance—care shall be taken that they are fit—fit as to age, fit as to experience.

Now, an individually effective hand was in the amendment which passed the Senate, defined as follows:

That is, of a rating not less than able seaman, and no one shall be signed as an able seaman—

That is an injunction laid on the owner of the ship and the master of the ship. It carries with it a liability for disregard of law. When you find that the temptation to rake in dollars, as in the Slocum case, at the peril of the lives of thousands, is too strong to be resisted, it ought not to need much argument to convince Congress that this is a point for needed care—no one shall be signed as an able seaman unless he shall be 19 or more years of age and shall have served at least three years on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes.

Mr. President, the British commission fixed the standard at three years. That is a country of sailors. Some members of the commission thought three years too short a time. Apprenticeship, I understand, in the British merchant marine is four years. I do not know how it is in our own.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. This matter was somewhat discussed by the Commission. I will say to the Senator I feel sure there will be no opposition to a suggestion to increase the term to three years. It may be a proper thing. It certainly will not do any special harm; it may do a great deal of good.

Mr. SPOONER. If it is an error, it is an error on the side of life and safety.

Mr. GALLINGER. I agree with the Senator about that. I think, however, the Senator's proportion that he has in that amendment, which he says was incorporated in a bill which, I think, came from the Committee on Commerce, would be absolutely impossible of fulfillment under existing conditions.

Mr. SPOONER. I have thought, Mr. President, that striking out from the naval-reserve provision that clause of it to which my motion was addressed, which enables a great mass of men to draw this sum each year without earning it at all, without sailing the sea a single day, would probably increase the number of real sailors, who, glad to take this additional pay, could be found to take the places necessary for the force upon which so much depends.

Mr. GALLINGER. It might somewhat increase it, but I think the Senator would find it a difficult task to discover the great mass of sailors that he speaks of, as they do not exist.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, take it on the St. Paul. There are 377 men, all told. Thirty-six of those men are supposed to be able seamen, perhaps, are able seamen within this definition, men who have served on deck at sea three years, or, as you have it here, two years. It would not be very difficult, I would think, with this increased pay which a man may earn if he only enlists, at the same time, to get 75 per cent of 36 men. But if that proportion is so high as to make it utterly impracticable, that is a matter for consideration.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. If my friend will permit me, I wish to call his attention to a point which he has not considered, or at least he has not mentioned it.

Mr. SPOONER. Undoubtedly there are many.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator is a distinguished lawyer, and has, perhaps, certainly as much influence as anyone in the Senate and outside of it in framing public opinion. I believe he, as a lawyer in admiralty cases, in representing the owners of vessels, will agree that if the owner is not actuated by a higher motive he desires to protect his own property, his crew, and those who may take passage on his ship.

In referring to the statute of able seamen, the Senator from Wisconsin forgets that in the engineering department of every ship there is the great motor power for propelling the ship, while heretofore, when we were boys following the sea, it was the sails of our ships, the winds of heaven, and all the men on the deck were sailor men who might trim those sails to the breezes that propelled them through the ocean.

Now, the greatest danger on every steamship, as the Senator well knows, is that of fire and accident to the machinery of the ship. The engineer's crew are all trained and should have fire drill at least every week. That is the regulation of every well-organized steamship company. In the engineer's department the chief engineer takes charge of one of the boats, one on the starboard quarter or the port quarter. The first assistant engineer takes charge of another boat, and it is manned by the engineer's crew, who are well disciplined in the engineer's department. While perhaps the coal stokers and the firemen are not classified as able men, they are sailor men. Only a few weeks since there was a fire on one of the steamships on the Pacific coast, and, in a great measure, for the safety of that ship and the lives of the passengers they were indebted to the coal stokers down beneath the decks in the hold of the ship, who came to the deck and there manned the whole fire hose and extinguished the fire.

So in the steward's department, while they are not sailor men, seamen in the words of the statute, the chief steward is assigned to one of the boats, and when the gong rings the alarm for fire each one is at his station and mans the halyards and swings the davits, if he does not become rattled and disabled to do his duty.

Therefore, I want to say to the Senator from Wisconsin, we all have the same object in view, to see that the ships are properly equipped and manned, but the necessity does not exist that there shall be so many able seamen on a steamship as on a sailing ship, because each department of the ship, as I have said before, the engineers, the steward's department, the coal passers, the firemen, are all disciplined and drilled, and when the fire alarm is struck, if they know their duty and have been properly disciplined, they are at their stations to save life and property.

I am in full accord with the Senator's views; and if the bill is defective, we ought all of us to unite together and perfect it. If two years' experience is not sufficient, let us give them three or four years' experience. But there are many who learn more in six months or a year at sea than others who have followed it all their lives. I have been shipmate on ship with sailors where there were thirty-six able seamen and only four boys or four ordinary seamen, and it was only one of us four boys who was permitted to steer that ship, to remain at the helm. It was because those boys had an interest in what they were doing. They were looking forward, and hoped to rise by faithfulness and by an intelligent understanding of their duties as sailor men on that ship.

I have been connected for many years with the transportation business on the Pacific coast. We had 3,000 sailors at one time in our employ, and there was not an engineer on a ship who did not come up there from a water tender or a fireman. There was not a captain or a mate or a boatswain on that ship who did not come in through the forecastle and work himself up to the position he held as an officer. That is the right kind of spirit to have in the sailor men, and I join the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Maine and other Senators in giving a dignity, if I might use the expression, to the profession of a seaman, for it requires great personal courage, skill, and application if he would rise and excel in his profession.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I simply wanted to inform the Senator from Wisconsin that there is a bill now under consideration by the Committee on Commerce and that letters have been received from all over the country asking to be heard on that very bill, and the bill deals with the very subject the Senator is now talking about. There will be hearings in the committee for at least two or three weeks on the very question which the Senator is arguing, and I hope the Senator will attend the hearings and hear the other side, if there is any other side.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I am very glad to have yielded to the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. He referred to me and my knowledge as a distinguished admiralty lawyer. I never tried an admiralty case in my life.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator has the ability to try one, at any rate.

Mr. SPOONER. I have lived in a region where the only vessel was a prairie schooner or a Milwaukee schooner [laughter], and I do not, in what I present to the Senate on this subject, speak from experience or technical knowledge. But there is one Senator here who out of large experience could give the Senate much information, and that is the distinguished Senator from California, who is not only a distinguished Senator, but, I was about to say, an Ancient Mariner. I will not say that, however, because that would be a charge of age which the Senator's appearance successfully refutes. But I did not learn from the Senator's observations whether he is in favor of or opposed to the amendment which I read in the presence of the Senate.

Mr. PERKINS. I am in favor of the amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. I am profoundly grateful, Mr. President, that I have been able to bring the distinguished Senator from California, and the only member of the Senate, so far as I know, who has ever served as a sailor, to the support of this proposition. I shall offer it now with sublime faith that it will be adopted. I move to strike out all of subdivision 3, on page 8, after the word "citizen," in the twenty-first line, and to insert the following:

Provided, That except in the case of steamers navigating rivers exclusively at least 75 per cent of the navigating crew, exclusive of licensed officers, shall be individually effective hands—that is, of a rating not less than able seamen; and no one shall be signed as an able seaman unless he shall be 19 years or more of age and shall have served at least three years on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes.

The Senator from New Hampshire will observe that I have, by this amendment, attempted to open the door, which his bill closes and locks, to the sailors of the Great Lakes, to make it possible for them to enter that part of the merchant marine of the United States which is to draw this bounty during the years which the Government shall pay it. There is no stormier sea, no more dangerous navigation, to be found anywhere than on the Great Lakes. There are men—and they made their skill and their presence known in the late war with Spain—in great numbers on the Great Lakes—men from Wisconsin, from Minnesota, from Michigan, from Ohio, and from other States—as competent to handle ships on the great sea as they are on the Great Lakes.

There is no reason why any bill should be drawn upon this subject which with studious care excludes them, and it surprised me a little that they should be excluded when we remember not only their fitness and the splendid character of the school of seamanship in which they are educated, but the fact that only last session Congress passed this proposition with that element of eligibility service on the Great Lakes in it and this bill leaves it out. I can not suppose it was intended to narrow the operation of this bill to the Atlantic or the Pacific coast, but certainly a broad spirit of the legislation ought to seek to bring to the service of the Government in time of peace and in time of war sailors from everywhere in the United States. So I hope that proposition will be adopted.

I wish to offer two more amendments to the bill, each of which involves the same proposition, and I shall have finished. I move to strike out subdivision 6, on page 9, and at the top of page 10; I also move to strike out section 7, beginning in line 19, on page 15, and extending to line 7, on page 16.

Those are sections which require as a condition precedent to the payment of the bounty or subvention, that the master of the ship shall employ and have on the ship one-eighth, one-sixth, and ultimately one-fourth of the naval reserve. It says "one-fourth of the crew." I believe that would be a very large number under the statutory definition of "crew" and under the definition of "crew," as given by Judge Story in 3 Sumner, as comprising "every one employed in any capacity on a ship."

The master ought to be left free to employ members of the naval reserve if he can get them and they satisfy him. He ought to be left free to employ good American sailors wherever they come from, whether they have entered into this naval enlistment or not.

The provision of the bill which proposes to pay these men a bounty simply for having served six months at sea, or, not having served a day at sea during the year, in consideration of their contract to serve in war if called upon, and to make their employment compulsory, is to put the Government in the attitude of giving to a class not simply the open door to an employment, but a governmental pressure for employment to the exclusion of men just as capable and just as patriotic.

There is a principle in it that is un-American; there is a principle in it that may well force men to abandon a career at sea in some measure, unless they shall have enlisted in the naval reserve; and the more successful this proposition for a naval reserve becomes, the more men who enter into it, the more pronounced and intensified will be the injustice worked by it or through it to Americans capable of splendid service at sea in time of peace and in time of war, but who nevertheless do not care to enter the naval reserve and to collect from the Government this retainer, as it is called, which they will not earn, and which they have not asked for, and which they do not want. It ought to be omitted.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, in line with the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], to secure a better class of seamen, and to make it an easier matter to secure American seamen or those who may become American citizens, I offer what I send to the desk as an additional section to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado submits an amendment intended to be proposed by him, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as an additional section the following:

No subvention, compensation, or subsidy provided for in this act shall be paid for any steamship or other ship that carries any Mongolian as part of its deck force or crew.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will lie on the table.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I simply want to say a few words in support of the amendment——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for one moment in order that I may submit a motion?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion submitted by the Senator from Nevada will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is moved by Mr. NEWLANDS:

That S. 529 be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce, with instructions to report in connection therewith an estimate of the cost of the vessels required for service in the ocean mail lines provided for in section 6, and as to whether it is practicable for the United States Government to construct such ships as a part of the Navy, supplementary to the war ships, to be used as colliers, transports, scouts, etc., in the emergency of war, and as to whether it is practicable to lease such ships to private corporations in times of peace for the service of the mail lines contemplated in section 6, and as to whether it is practicable to organize a naval reserve to be enlisted in the United States in the service of such ships whose wages shall be paid three-fourths by the private corporations leasing such ships, and one-fourth by the United States Government; such naval reserves to be composed of citizens of the United States, or of those who have declared their intention to become such—and to be subject to the training of naval officers in order to fit them to respond to the call of the Government in case of war, and the rentals received from such ships to form a fund for the gradual enlargement of the number of supplementary ships required by the Navy in case of war, as colliers, transports, scouts, etc., and generally to report the comparative cost of such method of enlarging our merchant marine as compared with the method of subvention provided by section 6.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion intended to be proposed by the Senator from Nevada will lie upon the table.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, one of the best features, I think, and the only good feature of the bill so well urged by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], is the naval-reserve feature, although connected with it there are a number of objectionable things. But the avowed purpose of that is to secure more effective seamen, to secure a greater number of American seamen on the vessels that may fly the American flag; and all Senators concur in the view that the more successful that effort may be, the better will be the sea service of American ships and American shipowners, and the more effective will be the American Navy manned by men who have had the training that this system most likely will give to them.

The amendment which I have introduced, Mr. President, only relates to the ship deck or the deck force or crew.

There are not very many American lines that use Mongolian deck crews or sailors, but those lines not only use Mongolians for crews but they use them for waiters and for what may be called the minor duties—duties that require less judgment and discipline and courage than are required from those who constitute the deck crew or force.

The amendment will not interfere in anywise with the steamers that carry Mongolians for waiters or for taking care of the cabins, or for any of the work that is necessary to be done on board ship that is not done by what are called the "deck crew" or "force."

But little reflection, it seems to me, must convince any Senator that the effort to secure a naval reserve must be a failure as to any lines of ships that carry Chinese for their deck crew or force. The American sailor or the foreigner who has declared his intention to become an American citizen will be very reluctant to ship in any vessel upon an equality with a Mongolian sailor, whether it be as stoker or whether it be for the management of the vessel in other departments.

Such men are unwilling to place themselves upon a perfect equality in labor or in any other lines with the Mongolian. Therefore, I take it, Mr. President, that even with this law for the naval reserve in force, with these ship companies required to employ a certain percentage of those who are members of the naval-reserve force, there will not only be difficulty to secure them for those vessels, but in many cases there is likely to be absolute rebellion.

Then, again, if we are making an honest effort to secure a large force of American sailors, or a force of those who have declared their intention to become American citizens, and are liable to become full citizens, in so far as a Chinaman is permitted to constituted one of the deck force the effort must be positively unavailing, for he can neither become a citizen nor declare his intention to become a citizen.

Under those circumstances, Mr. President, having in mind the avowed object of this bill, no subsidy or subvention or compensation, such as is provided for in this bill, should go to a vessel that uses as a part of its crew force a class of men that will nullify every effort that is put forth by the Government in that direction and to secure that end.

We know by the very solemn decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the wreck of the Rio de Janeiro in San Francisco Harbor, that by reason of the fact, as I understand that decision, that the working crew of that vessel was composed of Chinese, the owners of the vessel were declared judicially to be guilty of such negligence as made them responsible for damages for every life that was lost and for every dollar's worth of property that was lost. The fact that that vessel was manned by a Chinese crew, instead of by a white crew, seemed to have been accepted by the court as negligence per se.

The testimony was overwhelming that, when bravery and courage and presence of mind were needed in the case of that awful calamity in San Francisco Harbor, they might as well have had a body of wild animals in a stampede upon the decks of the vessel as the Chinese crew with which the vessel was manned. I take it that there have been many other disasters——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suppose the term "Mongolian," used in the Senator's amendment, would include Japanese, would it not?

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not know whether that is necessarily so or not. I do not believe it is necessarily so. That is my judgment about it——

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it is so, and my attention was directed to the Senator's suggestion——

Mr. PATTERSON. But I am entirely willing to change the term "Mongolian" to "Chinese," so as to make the class of sailors upon American vessels whom I have in mind entirely clear and distinct.

Mr. GALLINGER. The observation I was going to make in relation to the Senator's statement that Chinamen lacked courage was that a portion of those he would exclude—the Japanese—have demonstrated that they have remarkable courage.

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not think there can be much doubt of the class I had in mind. I had in mind the Chinese, with which a number of American vessels that ply from harbors on the Pacific coast to the Asiatic coasts are manned.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I call the attention of the Senator to his use of words which technically have a great meaning. The Senator talks about "crew force" and about "sailors." Under a statute of the United States "a crew" or "the sailors" means everybody employed on a ship below the master, and surely the Senator does not mean that Chinese shall be excluded as stokers. He knows perfectly well that no American can be hired on a steamship as a stoker.

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator from Maine is very greatly mistaken, because the ships of one of the companies that is to be a beneficiary under this bill plying between our northern ports and Australian ports are manned without Chinese.

Mr. FRYE. I understand that.

Mr. PATTERSON. They are prohibited from entering those harbors if they have Chinese above or below.

Mr. FRYE. But that is not the point to which I was calling the Senator's attention. It will not do to say in an amendment, unless the Senator really means it, that the "crew" must be so and so or the "sailors" must be so and so, because the terms "crew" and "sailors" include everybody on a ship except the captain—stokers, waiters, and everybody else.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will suggest to the Senator from Maine that the term I used is "deck force or crew."

Mr. FRYE. But the Senator two or three times has used the term "crew force."

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh, well——

Mr. FRYE. I did not notice what the amendment was, but I noticed the Senator's language.

Mr. PATTERSON. I used the term "deck force or crew." I have it from what the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] calls "good sailor men" that that designates really the working force of the ship as distinguished from waiters, cabin boys, and those who perform labor of that kind.

With that explanation, Mr. President, changing the word "Mongolian" to "Chinese," I think that I may urge the adoption of this amendment with a great deal of logic. I can not see how the advocates of this measure can avoid the inevitable conclusion, from the feeling that exists between the American, or the ordinary white man, and the Chinese, that the presence of Chinese occupying positions of equality will almost necessarily result in keeping from off any such vessels the average white sailor, and particularly the American sailor, or the person filling the vocation of a sailor who has had the United States sufficiently in mind to have made his application to become a citizen of this country.

Mr. President, if we want the deck force of these vessels such a force that can be relied upon in hours of peril and danger, a force that alone prevents such disaster as that of the Rio de Janerio and the Slocum, such a force as has given glory and honor to the merchant service of the English and German speaking people by reason of their intrepidity, their courage, their presence of mind, and their self-denial in hours of danger, we must not, it seems to me, encourage the use as seamen upon American vessels of those who will only prevent men with the qualifications I have suggested from becoming the force of the vessel and giving to the vessels and those who entrust themselves to them in the crossing of great oceans the confidence that all should have when they start out upon a voyage.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Colorado, if he can furnish the information. What is the proportion of the deck force in number to the entire number of the crew on a Pacific mail steamer, for instance?

Mr. PATTERSON. On the steamers that ply between San Francisco——

Mr. BACON. And Hongkong.

Mr. PATTERSON. And Hongkong and the Philippines and Japan stopping at Yokohama, Kobe, Nagasaki, Hongkong——

Mr. BACON. And Shanghai.

Mr. PATTERSON. Shanghai and those ports, the working force, outside of the officers and the boatswains, is solidly Chinese.

Mr. BACON. The Senator did not understand my inquiry. I want to know what is the proportion between the deck force. The Senator's amendment applies only to the deck force, and I wanted to know, for my information, what is the relative number of the deck force as compared with the entire crew, as defined by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], constituting the entire ship's company.

Mr. PATTERSON. I am not able to give the proportion, but I would say it was probably a third or a half. I have very vague information about it by reason of my observations in going from port to port in one of those vessels.

Mr. BACON. I will state the object of the inquiry. The deck force, it is true, has the responsibility for the management of the ship in ordinary times, but in times of danger, to which the Senator alludes, the entire ship's crew, except possibly those who are kept below with the engine, are brought on deck. They all have their duties; they are in squads and under officers, each assigned to his place and to his particular duty.

It seems to me the reasoning of the Senator would require more than the exclusion of the Mongolian or the Chinese from the deck crew, if the Senator's idea is to be carried out, because in times of peril the entire ship's crew, except those who may be necessary at certain particular points, like the engine room, are required to be on deck. They are assigned to certain posts, and each party has its duty to perform. At least that is my observation. I have not had the experience the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] has had in the matter, but, like the Senator from Colorado, I have had the opportunity to see it in a superficial way. It occurs to me that in a time of peril those who are relied upon are not limited to the deck force, but all of them are called upon to do certain duties at that time, and it is very important that they should perform those duties well for the safety of the ship's passengers.

Mr. PATTERSON. From my observation, not very extensive, the Senator from Georgia is right. All the force—the waiters, those who attend the cabin, and every man on board ship—when peril comes is expected to perform certain preordained duty. I recollect very well we had at stated intervals what are called "fire drills." Upon the clanging of the bell, a signal which they all recognized, waiters, sailors, everybody upon deck apparently rushed to the position they were expected to occupy in the event of a fire; manned ropes that controlled the boats that hung by the davits ready to be dropped into the sea, and took other positions.

The Senator from Georgia is also right when he suggests that the full force expected to do work of that kind should be of a class whose courage would meet any required emergency.

But it does not follow that because you can not have a hundred or two hundred of the right kind of sailors, therefore you can abandon the vessel to the extent of having none. The greater the number of cool, courageous, self-denying men on board a vessel in time of such danger, the less likelihood there is of panic, which usually results so fatally. One brave man, perhaps, may entirely control a half dozen or a dozen who, left to themselves, would prove wholly inadequate for an emergency. If in a crew of 200 men you have 50 men or 75 men upon whom you can rely with a reasonable degree of certainty to perform their duty as becomes men, as becomes brave men and brave sailors, just to that extent the less is the liability of a panic, which is always the cause of the greatest and most serious of disasters.

I realize that it would be useless to insist that the entire working force of a vessel shall be other than Chinese. I would not hope to meet with any encouragement or with much encouragement in this body for a proposition of that kind. But when the object of the amendment is simply to exclude Chinese from that force, with which the American sailors and those who have declared their intention to become American citizens must work upon an equality, must mingle in the same quarters in the vessel, must eat at the same table, and form parts and parcels of the same squad in the different work that the deck hands are required to perform, there should be reasonable hope, in view of the avowed object of this bill, of securing an amendment that will prevent a condition which will stand as an obstacle to having good and reliable sailors on vessels that carry Chinese crews and Chinese help, all except the officers, from the highest to the lowest.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Colorado to say there were very few steamship lines carrying Mongolians in the crews. Am I correct in that?

Mr. PATTERSON. With the permission of the Senator from New Hampshire, I will say that I understood that none of the lines which touch at Australasian ports, as they are called—Australia and New Zealand—have Chinese on board, because such vessels are prohibited the use and benefits of the port.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is undoubtedly true.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. But is it not a fact that foreign steamship lines running in competition with our lines on the Pacific do employ Chinese and Lascars in their crews?

Mr. PATTERSON. I am not sufficiently well acquainted with the facts to say yes or no.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that every foreign steamship line on the Pacific does.

Mr. PATTERSON. But I would not be a bit astonished if steamship lines that do not touch at ports which prohibit the entrance of vessels with Chinese crews did employ Chinese to a greater or less extent on all their vessels.

Mr. GALLINGER. They also use Lascars, the lowest possible form of seamen.

Mr. PATTERSON. And the Chinese, I suppose, are the cheapest sailors that can be hired upon the sea.

Mr. GALLINGER. Except the Lascars.

Mr. President, this is a pretty important matter. The Chinese question is somewhat acute in this country just now. It is to be investigated, I believe, by a committee of this body. I have very pronounced opinions, which I will not express to-day, as to the treatment the Chinese have received from the Government of the United States in the past. I think we are to reap our reward in due time, as I have always believed we would, but that is not connected with this question. This is a practical business proposition which the Senator projects into the debate.

Mr. PERKINS. With the permission of the Senator from New Hampshire, I should like to call attention to the fact that there is running in competition with the Oceanic Line a Japanese line that receives an annual subsidy of $263,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is true.

Mr. PERKINS. The question is, Have they Japanese or Mongolian crews, or have they a Caucasian crew?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not imagine they have many Caucasians.

As I was about to say, this is a cold business proposition. I have thought from this debate that some Senators would like to blot out the little remnant that we have of an American merchant marine, and it strikes me that this proposition lends color to that impression.

Mr. R. P. Schwerin, the accomplished manager of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, was before the Merchant Marine Commission in San Francisco. He is a man in whose integrity some of us have implicit confidence, and he was interrogated on this particular point. Mr. Schwerin gave the Commission an illustration of what this would mean. He took the China, the Korea, and the Mongolia, three ships operated by his line, and gave a comparison as to what would be the additional cost to operate those ships with American crews in competition with Japanese ships and with European steamship lines which have mixed crews—Europeans, Asiatics, and Lascars. He said:

> First, the China, a trans-Pacific passenger boat of 5,060 gross tonnage. I will designate the crew composed of European officers and Asiatics as a mixed crew against a crew composed entirely of Europeans as a European crew. The China's monthly pay roll with a mixed crew is $3,175.52, with a European crew is $6,715, so that the loss per annum operating with a European crew only would be $42,743.76.
> Secondly, the Korea and her sister ship, the Siberia, of 11,284 gross tonnage. The total wages per month with a mixed crew amount to $5,086.03, with a European crew to $11,050.25. The loss per annum operating with a European crew only would be $71,570.64.
> Third, the Mongolia and her sister ship, the Manchuria, of 13,300 gross tonnage. The monthly pay roll with a mixed crew is $4,863.62, with a European crew, $10,075.25. Her loss per annum operating with a European crew would be $62,538.36.

I thought there were three ships, but there are five. It would make a total addition of $176,852.76 per year to the present cost of running those ships, if the Senator's amendment should prevail, and this, be it said, is an American line of steamships that is not receiving any subvention from the Government.

Mr. Schwerin went on to say that he could not get any more freight if he had a European crew, could not earn any more money, and it is a well-known fact that his line is not making much profit, if any, at the present time. And yet by the adoption of this amendment we would compel him either to stop running his ships as American ships or else submit to an enormous loss in operating expenses.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. Does the line of ships that Mr. Schwerin represents receive any benefit under this bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not now; but there is a provision in the bill that would give that line a subvention, but Mr. Schwerin has said to the Commission frankly that he doubts very much whether they will accept it because of other conditions in the bill. He has not accepted the subvention under the law of 1891.

Mr. PATTERSON. So it would not disturb his line in the least, because my amendment refers only to those who receive benefits under this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then the Senator enlightens me on that point. If Mr. Schwerin or his line should accept the subvention in this bill, then, of course, it would affect his line. I thought the Senator's amendment was more comprehensive than it seems to be. But I think, even if the proposition applies only to subsidized vessels, that it should still be considered carefully.

Mr. PATTERSON. It simply provides in effect that no compensation or subsidy or subvention provided for in this bill shall be given to vessels that carry Chinese as a part of their deck force or crew.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not quite catch the wording of the amendment when it was read; but, Mr. President, I am of opinion that in a broad way it will prove a great detriment to the efforts that are being made to get more American ships, and I hope that the Senator's amendment may not be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin is much more far-reaching than has been suggested. There is a bill pending before the Committee on Commerce now in relation to the very amendment which he offered, and there are to be hearings, and extended hearings, before the committee in that regard, and I hope that Senators who have not heard both sides of the case will be very careful when they give consideration to this matter.

Mr. President, now that I am up, I desire to say a few words in relation to the bill and the general subject. I have talked so many times and at such great length on these shipping questions that I do not propose to afflict the Senate with another speech. But I do wish to say a few words.

When I had the floor the other day the Senator from Texas asked me a question, which I see by referring to the RECORD I did not answer. I forgot it entirely, because a colloquy sprung up in relation to the tariff; and I desire now to answer the question asked by the Senator from Texas. He wished to know whether I did not think it was better for the people of this country to pay from a hundred and fifty to two hundred million dollars a year to foreigners for carrying our exports and imports, provided they were carried more cheaply than we could afford to carry them. I emphatically say, no; and I as emphatically say that I believe that four-fifths of the intelligent people in the United States of America would agree with me when I say no.

Mr. President, I believe it would be infinitely better for our country in all of its interests—and this one which we are discussing is, from a national standpoint, the most important of all of them—to take that $200,000,000 paid annually to foreigners for carrying our exports and imports, and with that money start our shipbuilding industry all over the United States, revive it from practical bankruptcy to prosperity, and build ships out of our own materials lying now in the earth, in the shape of iron and coal, and in the forests; employ our own skilled workmen, employ our own material men, instead of employing those of foreign countries, even though it cost us a little more.

And furthermore, Mr. President, I do not agree that they are carrying it any cheaper than we could carry it. Who knows, when there is no competition on our part with them, whether or not they are charging higher prices than we could afford to carry for. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] a day or two ago, speaking on this very subject, said that there had been a union between all the sailing ships of Great Britain and Germany and France engaged in the carrying trade of our exports and our imports—a union for the purpose of fixing rates and for the purpose of driving out all competition. Is it possible that in fixing their rates they will not fix them at as high a point as the traffic will bear? Whence comes the competition with them? We have no ships engaged in the foreign trade. There is no competition on our part.

Then, again, I am an American, and I confess that it is awfully humiliating to me to travel round the world and never see the American flag except on the homes of the United States consuls or diplomatic officers—no American flag in any port abroad. Here is one of the most powerful and one of the wealthiest countries in the world, a maritime country, with an enormous coast line, over 10,000 miles in extent, with great harbors and great rivers, with a commerce last year, exports and imports, amounting to two billion six hundred-odd million dollars, with iron and coal enough to supply the whole world, with forests without limit, with skilled mechanics and plenty of them, and yet this great nation has permitted its commercial rivals on the oceans to seize upon the great pathways of the seas and exclude us almost entirely from them. I say to me, an American citizen, it is humiliating beyond expression.

Look at it for a single moment and see where we were last year. Last year no American vessel entered or cleared in the foreign trade in the following countries: Austria-Hungary, Denmark, Italy, Netherlands, Russia, Spain, Norway, Sweden, Portugal, Greece, Turkey, Scotland, and Ireland; 1 steamer, France; 2, Germany; 57 clearances for and entries from England, 47 of them the American Line alone. The other 10 steamers were built in expectation of the passage of the shipping bill of 1901. For the entire continent of Europe there were 88 American entries out of a total of 4,154. There were 90 American clearances out of a total of 4,490. Forty-seven of these were of the American Line alone.

It seems to me the people of the United States participate with me in the humiliation. I remember calling the attention of the Senate in a former speech to a singular case. The bark Hamilton Fish entered Bergen, the principal port of Norway. The consul at that port imposed upon the ship certain taxes which had been repealed years before. He was notified of the fact. He repaid the money, and as an excuse said: "I have been in Bergen as consul for fifteen years, and this is the only American vessel that has entered that port;" and it is the principal port of Norway. Now, ought not something to be done?

I took occasion to say the other day, with regard to the cost of building ships, that, in my judgment, it made but a small handicap; that it really was the operating of ships which excluded us from the ocean. I took occasion in 1901 to take four or five ships, well known to everybody, and to make exact comparisons, using the pay rolls of the ships themselves, so that there could be at that time no mistake whatever in relation to it, and there have been no changes from then to now in the matter of wages on those ships.

Take three ships—the St. Louis, ours, the Oceanic, and the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. The monthly wages on the St. Louis—leaving out the master, for the master is not included in any of these comparisons, and there is more difference in the pay of the masters of American ships than there is in the pay of any other officers—the monthly wages on the St. Louis amount to $11,305; on the Oceanic, $9,890; on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, $7,715; but the Oceanic is a larger and faster ship than the St. Louis, and carries 47 more men; the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse is still larger, and carries 120 more men. Now, if you reduce the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse to the same size and speed as the St. Louis, and reduce the Oceanic to the same size and speed and the same number of men with the St. Louis, you will find that the German ship is running monthly, on wages and food alone, for one-half what it costs the St. Louis, and that the British ship has the advantage over the American ship of one-third.

Now, take the Pacific Mail Steamship Line. On the City of Sydney the monthly pay roll amounts to $3,675, while on a corresponding ship under the Chilean flag it is $1,480—more than twice greater on the American ship. Take the Pacific Mail steamship Peru, with monthly wages of $3,835, and the corresponding ship under the Chilean flag, with monthly wages of $1,726. Take the American ship Cherokee, which was wrecked only the other day, sailing from New York to Santo Domingo, and the year's wages are $16,620, while on the British ship Cricket, of the same size, they are $10,219. Take the German ship Sonnigsberg, about the same size, and they amount to $7,500, less than one-half of the Cherokee. Take the Dutch ship Teutonic, and they amount to $6,643, in place of $16,620 on the Cherokee. Take the Norwegian ship Fortuna, and they amount to $6,128 instead of $16,620 on the Cherokee.

Now, I appeal to any intelligent man to show me how you are going to run an American ship against a British or a Norwegian or a Chilean or any other foreign ship. It can be done in only one way, and that is for the Treasury of the United States to equalize the conditions between the ships. Why should it not equalize the conditions when the Government protects every other industry in the entire country? Why should it neglect utterly and entirely and leave to the mercy of these foreigners that interest which from a national point of view is of much more value to the Republic than any of the other industries?

When the bill in 1901 was pending, it passed the Senate. The friends of the bill had the assurance that it would pass the House. I had no doubt about it at all. Shipbuilders wrote to me and asked my opinion. I gave it to them frankly, and they believed that it would become a law, and immediately on the strength of that belief they commenced working in their shipyards and building great ships and ships of great speed, to be engaged in the foreign trade. I know from every one of them that the ships were built alone in that expectancy. I will name the ships. The first one, the Korea, was commenced before that time.

Date of completion.	Vessel.	Gross tons.	Speed according to Lloyds'.
			Knots.
1902	Korea	11,276	13
1902	Shawmut	9,606
1902	Kroonland	12,760	16
1902	Tremont	9,606
1902	Siberia	11,284	18
1902	Finland	12,760	16
1902	Massachusetts	7,913	12
1903	Mississippi	7,914	12
1903	Maine	7,914	12
1903	Mongolia	13,638	16
1903	Missouri	7,914	12
1904	Manchuria	13,638	17

Every one of those ships was built and ready for sea in 1902 and 1903, entirely in expectation that that bill would become a law. If it had become a law, instead of carrying, as we did last year, only 12 per cent of our enormous commerce, amounting to two billion six hundred and odd million dollars, we would have been carrying at least one quarter of it by this time.

What effect did that have upon our carrying trade? In 1900

we carried but 8.2 per cent of all of our exports and imports, only 6 per cent of our exports; and immediately we began to increase in our carrying. In 1903 we carried 9.1 per cent; in 1904, 10.3 per cent, and in 1905, 12.1 per cent, entirely due to the fact that these ships had been built in the expectation that that bill would become a law and put them into commission on the ocean.

Mr. SPOONER. Were they laid up?

Mr. FRYE. Not at all. Four or five of them have been sold already, because it is difficult, I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin, to lay up a nice ship of thirteen of fourteen thousand tons. It is almost impossible to lay her up; it is better to run her at a loss than to lay her up, because she deteriorates very rapidly, like an untenanted house.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator expect from the operation of the bill, if it becomes a law, any diminution in the difference between the cost of operating American ships and the cost of operating the competitor ships?

Mr. FRYE. No; the Senator does not; but the Senator expects the Treasury of the United States to pay the difference.

Mr. SPOONER. Forever?

Mr. FRYE. I should hope, forever; at any rate, until we had recovered our place on the ocean. If we once recovered our place on the ocean we would hold it, I have no doubt.

Mr. SPOONER. Then, out of the Treasury is to be contributed enough money to make up the difference until we have recovered our place on the ocean?

Mr. FRYE. A republic that is building a canal that will cost anywhere from $200,000,000 to $300,000,000 for the accommodation of foreigners almost entirely can afford to pay a reasonable sum for taking care of its ships on the ocean.

Mr. SPOONER. I was only trying to get the Senator's opinion. I want to say to him that in large part we are building the canal in order to be able to run our Oregon between the west and the east coast when the safety of the country demands it without going around the Horn.

Mr. FRYE. I understand that it is to be coastwise so far as we are concerned—at any rate, coastwise so far as coastwise vessels are concerned—but the foreign ships, the large ships, will be the ships that will use it. I could not help thinking of the Galveston Harbor improvement when the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] was on the floor speaking about the gentleman who wrote him in relation to the matter of these subsidies. I think I had a good deal to do with it, too. I have been chairman of the Committee on Commerce for a good many years, and I have yet to find any Senator from the South complain that I have not been liberal in that regard. It was at my instigation that an amendment, prepared by me for the first time, that that wonderful improvement in Galveston Harbor was made possible. We had been expending year after year two or three hundred thousand dollars, and then the winds and the waves every other year would sweep away the expenditure of money that we had made. Finally I put into the river and harbor bill a continuing-contract clause by which the entire contract could be made at once and then be paid for from time to time. We have spent in the neighborhood of $5,000,000 on that harbor and just one American ship uses it.

Mr. GALLINGER. And that a schooner.

Mr. FRYE. And that is a schooner. I think that is a commentary.

Mr. President, I did not intend so much as I have been saying, but I wish to add a word or two more. I appointed this Commission, so far as the Senate was concerned. I selected the best men, I thought, for the business. And yet I did not have much confidence that they would accomplish much of anything. I regarded the proposition of the President of the United States for a commission as simply a tub to be thrown to the whale. I have been most agreeably disappointed. I do not believe there was ever a commission appointed by the United States Senate that has done more intelligent, faithful, honest, and wise work than this Commission which I had the honor of appointing and I congratulate them that they disappointed me so greatly in this regard.

This bill, after all of the evidence they have taken, is the result of their opinions and judgments from that evidence. To say that it is satisfactory to me I can not, because it does not go nearly so far as I would wish a bill to go. It leaves the North Atlantic without any ships whatever. It provides for no swift, high-powered ships fit for scouts in case of war. But I do not wonder that the Commission came to those conclusions, because, when the bill which I had the honor to report from the Committee on Commerce and undertake to get through the Senate was pending, the complaint was vigorously made in the Senate by a few on our side, by the many on the other, that we were building great and fast ships and were not paying attention enough to ordinary freighters. This Commission has attended more to ordinary freighters than it has to large and fast ships, but so far as the bill goes it is, in my judgment, an admirable one, and I am heartily in favor of its being enacted into law.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I want to say a few words in reply to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] with reference to the amendment that I offered.

While the Chinese question is acute, and I have no idea of precipitating any discussion upon the Chinese question, it is not too acute when the object of the Government in a shipping bill is to lay the foundation for a large force of American sailors available for the defense of the country, if that shall be needed, and that is calculated to give safety and confidence to American men and women when they take a voyage across the ocean.

I wish to correct some figures I gave somewhat tentatively, or rather doubtingly, a moment ago, and I think when I correct them the Senator from New Hampshire will have even less objection than he had when he understood the limited scope of the amendment I offered.

The number of men embraced in the term or phrase "deck force or crew" is about 10 per cent of the force. For instance, on the Manchuria, with a full working force of somewhere in the neighborhood of 400—between 350 and 400—the deck force or crew numbers about forty, and on the smaller vessels about twenty-five.

So the Senator from New Hampshire will see that this amendment, if adopted, and it seems to me the Senator should be willing that it should be adopted, will remove an obstacle to the efficient class of sailors that I have no doubt in the world he is anxious to secure upon every American vessel. A little reflection must tell him that upon any American vessel that ships Chinese as a part of its deck crew or force it is practically impossible to unite with them American sailors or Europeans who have declared their intention to become American citizens.

Under those circumstances it seems to me that there ought to be little or no objection to the amendment. It will tend very materially to forward what the Senator from New Hampshire says is the main purpose of this bill, or one of the two main purposes; first, to build up a splendid force of American sailors both on the Atlantic and on the Pacific coasts, as well as to encourage the construction and the sailing of American vessels. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to consider whether he will not permit the amendment to be adopted, and thus remove some obstacles in the way.

I offer, Mr. President, an additional amendment, and, as it might be considered somewhat radical, I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to pay attention to its reading, lest he might allow it to go unchallenged.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That on and after the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles coming into the United States the rates of duty provided for under the revenue laws of the United States: Provided, That upon all articles dutiable under said laws brought into the United States in any vessel hereafter built and registered in the United States or now duly registered by a citizen or citizens of the United States, including as such citizens any corporation created under the laws of the United States or of any of the States thereof, the rates of duties to be levied, collected, and paid shall be reduced 10 per cent of the rates leviable under said laws.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when the Merchant Marine Commission was created a majority of that Commission was in favor of discriminating duties. The distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], in appointing that Commission, distinctly stated, standing just where he does at the present moment, that he placed the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on the Commission because he was in favor of discriminating duties. The Commission performed the duty assigned them to the best of their ability, and I thank the Senator from Maine for publicly recognizing it. We did the best we could; and when we got through our investigation a very large majority of the Commission was of opinion that discriminating duties under existing conditions were utterly impossible. The Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] since that time has made a suggestion that we might return to them, but I am sure the Senator from Florida is not very insistent upon that.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me right there?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. It will be remembered by some Senators that I selected a committee of twenty-five expert men on shipping questions; that we worked some four or five months, that when we started into the work a majority of them were for trying the discriminating duties, and when we closed there was not one in favor of discriminating duties.

Just one word more. The proposition, coming from where it does, undoubtedly reduces the duty 10 per cent. The fathers started by reducing the duty 10 per cent. It did not last a great while. They then changed it to an increase of the duty 10 per cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was simply going to add, Mr. President, that I have always been puzzled when a Senator opposes a subvention or subsidy which takes money directly out of the Treasury for a purpose such as is contemplated in the pending bill, frequently upon the ground that it is unconstitutional, and at the same time claims that it is all right and constitutional to halt money before it gets into the Treasury and apply it to the same purpose. I confess I have never been able to work out to my intellectual satisfaction what the difference really is. If there was not any reduction of duty on the articles imported in American ships, the added money would go into the Treasury and be paid out, as this bill contemplates; while in the other instance the money is halted outside of the Treasury and is applied to substantially the same purpose. I have never been able, I say, to intellectually satisfy myself as to the line of reasoning which leads Senators to the conclusion that there is any substantial difference between those two methods.

But, Mr. President, the Commission with which I was humbly associated deliberately reached the conclusion that under existing conditions it would be idle to return to discriminating duties, inasmuch as from 65 to 75 per cent of our imports from countries where we want to establish trade are to-day on the free list and also from the fact we have thirty-odd commercial treaties with other countries that would have to be abrogated in whole or in part before we could do this thing. I am somewhat astonished that the Senator from Colorado revives that plan. I feel sure that whatever else we do we can not safely adopt that system, which did work well in the days of the fathers, when almost all our imports were on the dutiable list and when we had not any commercial treaties to trouble us. I think the Senator will himself conclude that the conditions have changed so materially that it is not possible for us to adopt that old system.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I am afraid there were too many stand-patters around that Commission. Perhaps there was a goodly number upon the Commission. But we know that the present tariff law is regarded as a sort of fetich upon which if you make a scratch or distort a member, or in anywise change it, you have committed the unpardonable, the unforgiven sin. I can well understand how when those who started in with a proposition that the way to build up the American Navy was by discriminating duties they were taken aside and one by one convinced that it would be a crime, that it would be unpardonable, to attempt to make a single inroad upon the present tariff system. For once you make a break, once you reduce a single schedule, then came the flood, and with the flood, I imagine, the reform, of which so many of our friends who are interested in maintaining this high protective tariff stand in awe.

Mr. President, so far as the treaties are concerned, I had occasion to examine into that question, I think it was last year, and I found that there was not one treaty which could not be gotten rid of within a year. All the President or the proper Department has to do is to announce that the treaty, either in whole or in part, is abrogated, and soon treaties would be entered into that would be void of the impediment which now stands in the way of any discrimination in the matter of duties. So far as that is concerned, then, it is no serious obstacle.

The only question is, will we enter upon this plan for the upbuilding of American shipping? Do we really want to give pleasure to the Senator from Maine when he visits foreign ports, that pleasure which is above everything else to him when absent from his own country—the American flag flying at the mast of an American ship? If that is the real desire of the Congress, there is no more certain and definite way of securing the change than by this system for the upbuilding of the American marine.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. PATTERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. As I understand the opinion and purpose of the Senator from Colorado, he is in favor of having the American flag fly upon a foreign-built ship?

Mr. PATTERSON. No, Mr. President; the Senator from Rhode Island did not understand my amendment as it was read.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was thinking about the Senator's discussion of it and not about his amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON. We have American-built vessels now and those that are at this time duly registered.

Mr. ALDRICH. I thought the Senator was in favor of free ships?

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I am not going to say that I am or that I am not, but surely this amendment that I have offered has no reference whatever to free ships. It provides for the American-built ship. Now, what would the result of this be, Mr. President? Ten per cent of the duties collected annually would be how much? I am not familiar now with the amount of duties that are collected.

Mr. ALLISON. About $250,000,000; from that amount to $300,000,000.

Mr. PATTERSON. Well, 10 per cent of $250,000,000 would amount to $25,000,000. With that prize before the American merchant, with $25,000,000 as the incentive to the importer of foreign goods into this country, he would always give preference to an American vessel. The difference is so great and the demand for American vessels would be so pronounced, that with this amendment upon the statute books, before three years, in my opinion, we would find the percentage doubled and trebled; and just as quickly as vessels could be built in the United States they would take their place in our foreign shipping trade and supplant the foreign vessel.

There is a very considerable difference, it seems to me, at least to the people of the country, as to whether all the tariff duties shall be collected and paid into the Treasury and then cashed out upon warrants in the nature of subsidies and the like, or whether the Dingley tariff shall be reduced 10 per cent to the extent that American vessels will bring foreign-made goods into the United States. There is a very vast difference. The result would be, counting the charge for freights and counting the reduction of the tariff, that there would be a percentage upon the right side of the balance for the people of the country; and to that extent every man, woman, and child in the United States would receive some benefit from it. At the same time the process of weeding out foreign vessels would commence, and would progress with accelerated speed from month to month and from year to year until, if this incentive should be continued for a number of years, the old-time percentage of American commerce would be found carried in American bottoms. No good reason can be offered why this amendment should not be adopted, except that it is in opposition to the creed of the "stand-patters."

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator seriously think that an amendment of this kind could be adopted by the Senate?

Mr. PATTERSON. I am afraid there are too many stand-patters in the Senate for that.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not mean that.

Mr. PATTERSON. There are too many worshipers of the fetich.

Mr. ALDRICH. Constitutionally, I mean.

Mr. PATTERSON. I can see no trouble from the Constitution in a provision of that kind, and if there is I trust that my constitutional friend from the State of Rhode Island will point out wherein this would in anywise impinge upon the Constitution.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood the House of Representatives claimed the right under the Constitution to originate such legislation.

Mr. PATTERSON. The prime object of this, Mr. President, is to increase American shipping interests. The matter of revenue is a secondary consideration. The main object of this bill and of this amendment to the bill is to offer an inducement, a great inducement, one that will be effective, to American merchants and importers to see to it that their goods are carried in American ships—vessels registered under the American law and flying the American flag. I have no doubt in my mind about the Constitution in any wise interfering with the amendment. If the Senator from Rhode Island would lead off—and he comes at the head of the list—in voting "yea" for this amendment, it will be adopted and all trouble will disappear.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, when the ship-subsidy bill known as the "Hanna-Frye bill" was before Congress in 1902, I discussed it at length and gave the views I entertained in regard to the measure. The bill came before the Senate at the next session and we passed it. That bill never passed the House. It is my purpose to-day to occupy but a very few minutes of the time of the Senate in discussing the pending bill.

I recognize the fact that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has devoted much time to this measure; he has worked diligently, as he does upon all matters pertaining to legislation; but, Mr. President, I have examined the bill with care, and I can not give my consent to its passage.

I want to call the Senator's attention to the first section of the bill. The first section of the bill provides that every employee, both sailors and officers, in the service of the owners of ships engaged in the coasting trade or in our foreign trade shall be entitled to become a part of the naval reserve. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that more than 70,000 persons are employed by the private shipowners of the United States in our coasting trade, in our foreign trade, and on the Great Lakes, and every single one of those employees will be entitled to become a member of the naval reserve and draw a salary out of the Treasury of the United States.

The Senator is fully aware of the fact that this naval reserve will not be of any special benefit or perform any special service for the Government of the United States. It is true that it is provided in the bill that in the event we should have war and the President should desire to have the services of this naval reserve he may call on them; but we know, Mr. President, that that is not the object and purpose of a naval reserve. The object and purpose of this naval reserve is to make the Government of the United States pay to the private employees of the owners of ships an additional salary to that which they draw from their employers in order to make their pay equal to the pay of those employed in foreign ships. This is called a naval reserve simply for the purpose of trying to show that the Government is to receive some service for this expenditure.

I want to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to this fact, as I remember the speech that was made by the Senator from Ohio, Mr. Hanna, when this subject was pending here before. It was contended that the officers and the petty officers on foreign ships and American ships received practically the same salary, for I have now a speech that was made by the distinguished Senator, and I want to call attention to the fact that the officers on foreign ships to-day receive practically the same salary that officers and petty officers receive on American ships. The difference in wages is not as to officers, but the difference in wages to a large extent is as to the common sailor, and the money paid in this instance—the difference—is practically paid to the officers and not to the common sailors.

Again, you will find, Mr. President, between thirty and forty thousand men employed on our ships in the coasting trade. The coasting trade belongs to American ships. Foreigners can not come in here and engage in our coasting trade. I am at a loss to know why we should pay a part of the wages to the owners of ships engaged in the coasting trade for the purpose of building up our foreign commerce. I apprehend that in all probability there will be a membership equal to fifteen or twenty thousand in this naval reserve from the coasting trade, and why we should pay them a salary out of the Treasury of the United States to increase the pay that the owners of the ships are paying them to-day I am utterly unable to understand. I understand that most of the naval reserve will be made up from the employees engaged in the coastwise service.

Now, I want to call the Senator's attention to another fact. You take the Hanna-Frye bill. That bill was to continue in operation for a period of twenty years, and at the end of twenty years the subsidy proposed to be given by it was to stop; but you take the bill we now have before us and there is no limit to the subsidy. The subsidy, it is true, is not paid to a particular ship after ten years. That is presumed to be the life of a ship. But then there is a new ship, and this subsidy is immediately given to the new ship, and it goes on indefinitely.

The Senator from New Hampshire says that Congress may ultimately repeal this law. But my observation has taught me that when you show special favoritism, when you make donations to a private interest for that interest to carry on its business, it is a difficult task to secure its repeal by Congress. Suppose the subsidy goes on for a period of ten years and until $40,000,000 every year shall be paid out of the public Treasury for the purpose of aiding our shipowners. When Congress attempts to repeal it, you will find a lobby here in this Capitol protesting against it and declaring that American interests will be destroyed by virtue of the repeal of this law.

Mr. President, if you are going to have a subsidy, it ought to be for a certain period of time, and at the end of that time it ought to stop.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] raised a point that nobody has answered. I have examined the bill critically, and if that Senator is not correct in his interpretation of it, I can not understand the English language. The Senator says that this bill is intended to build up our foreign commerce; that it is intended to have American products carried in American ships—our exports and our imports—but if you will take this bill and read it, as was stated by the Senator from Iowa, you will find that the American ship, under this bill, can sail away from an American port and go across the ocean to a foreign country and can spend almost an entire year going from port to port in foreign countries and then come back to America and draw this subsidy.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, while I am not profoundly impressed with that objection to the bill, yet I will say to the Senator from Georgia that I have offered an amendment this morning which I think will remove that objection.

Mr. CLAY. I did not know it. I presume the amendment, then, must have been offered to-day in the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]——

Mr. GALLINGER. Did I understand the Senator correctly to say that this bill was going to cost $20,000,000 a year?

Mr. CLAY. No; I did not. I said the time might come when it will cost $40,000,000 a year. There is no telling how much it will cost twenty-five or thirty years from now.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] made a very happy speech. The Senator from Maine always makes happy speeches, and I do not know of any man that I would rather have on my side of a cause than the Senator from Maine. That Senator said that we were paying $200,000,000 a year to the owners of foreign ships to carry our commerce abroad, and that we do not pay it to the owners of American ships because the owners of American ships could not carry our exports as cheaply as the owners of foreign ships could carry them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken. The Senator from Maine said we did not do it because we had not the ships.

Mr. CLAY. Well, it amounts to the same thing.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no.

Mr. CLAY. It amounts to the same thing, because the Senator from Maine intended to say that the Germans, the French, the Norwegians, and the English can build and operate ships more cheaply than we can, and consequently they can carry freights much cheaper than we can, and therefore Americans did not invest their money in the shipping business.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me, I am sure the Senator from Maine and no other Senator in this body has ever made that suggestion.

Mr. CLAY. I think the Senator from New Hampshire is mistaken. The Senator is usually correct, but I think he is mistaken in this instance.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I will call his attention to the fact that on the Great Lakes, where we have nothing but American ships, we have the cheapest transportation in all the world.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator does not contend that, if all of the products of our farms and factories were carried in American ships, our freights would be carried any more cheaply than they are now carried in foreign ships?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not contend that; but I have no doubt they could be carried as cheaply.

Mr. CLAY. They might be carried as cheaply if we paid them enough to make up the difference; but I have never been able to make up my mind to tax the farmer, the merchant, the shoemaker, and the banker and take money out of their pockets to enable any private interest to be carried on unless the public is to be served by such taxation. Now, if the Government is to receive a service by reason of a subsidy, if the Government is to be benefited—that is, if the American people as a whole are to be benefited—then there might not be any objection to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, that is exactly what we contend, that the entire American people will be benefited.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from Maine said that the $200,000,000 we pay foreigners for the purpose of carrying our exports and imports would be utilized by Americans in building ships in this country. The farmers and the manufacturers undoubtedly would have to pay the same amount in freight that they pay at this time.

A great deal has been said, Mr. President, about wages. I only intended to occupy a limited time of the Senate. The Senator from Maine read some interesting figures. I have some figures here which were furnished me, that came from the Commissioner of Navigation, which I used heretofore in the argument of this question. I then said:

> A critical examination of the wages paid American and foreign crews will show that many of the employees receive practically the same wages. Examine the wages paid the entire crew of the fast American liner St. Paul and the fast Liverpool passenger liner Campania, and you will see that more than one-fourth of these crews on the foreign and American lines draw practically the same wages.

Let us take the English ship. The chief engineer on an English ship receives $150 per month; the American engineer on the same class of ship receives $150 per month; the first engineer on an English ship receives $100 per month, and on an American ship he receives $100 per month. Now, take the junior first assistant engineer. On an American ship he receives $85 per month, and on an English ship he receives $82.50 per month. Take the second senior engineer. On an American ship he receives $70 per month and on the English ship $72.50. Go on down the list, and you will find that the fourth engineer on the English ship receives $67.50 and on the American ship $67.50.

If you will take the common sailors, you will find that the common sailor in England receives $23.75 and in the United States $25 per month.

Mr. President, I will ask that the entire table from which I have read may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

The crew wages on the American line are as follows:

Chief officer	$120.00
Second officer	70.00
Third officer	60.00
Fourth officer	40.00
Chief engineer	150.00
First assistant engineer	100.00
Junior first assistant engineer	85.00
Extra first assistant engineer	85.00
Second senior engineer	70.00
Junior second engineer	65.00
Senior third engineer	60.00
Junior third engineer	55.00
Fourth engineer	50.00
Carpenter	50.00
Carpenter's mate	35.00
Boatswain	37.50
Boatswain's mate	27.50
Master at arms	25.00
Sailors	25.00

Making the total thus far of the American line, $1,210. Now, take the English line for the same class of employees:

Chief mate	$100.00
First officer	75.00
Second officer	62.50
Extra second officer	55.00
Third officer	50.00
Fourth officer	45.00
Chief engineer	150.00
Senior second engineer	100.00
Second engineer	82.50
Senior third engineer	75.00
Third engineer	72.50
Senior fourth engineer	67.50
Fifth engineer	60.00
Carpenter	40.00
Joiner	37.50
Boatswain	37.50
Boatswain's mate	27.50
Master at arms	22.50
Sailors	23.75

Making the total of $1,211.

Mr. CLAY. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the donations proposed in this bill for those who are to constitute the naval reserve range from $110 per year, I believe, to $24 per year. Officers are to be paid from $110 to $75 per year and the common sailor $24 per year.

I do not desire to go through this bill. I do not desire to discuss the different features of it; but I believe the time will come when American shipping will take care of itself. To say the least, Mr. President, you are beginning a system to-day that is to last indefinitely, so far as this legislation is concerned.

I understood the Senator from Maine—and he is always accurate—to say, in substance, that in ten or twelve years, in all probability, we could build ships as cheaply as any other country in the world. Then, if you are going to grant subsidies, if you are going to help American ships engaged in foreign commerce, why not provide in your bill that it shall last for a period of ten, twelve, or fifteen years?

If I remember correctly, even the Senator from Maine, who drafted the bill which passed the Senate some years ago, placed in that bill a provision that it should last for a period of twenty years; and I think the bill which was discussed at a previous session also provided that it should last for a period of twenty years.

Mr. President, to-day you are beginning a scheme that will eventually take an enormous amount of money out of the Treasury of the United States. I do not believe, where capital can not be invested in any enterprise or business that will prove successful, that the other business interests of the country ought to be taxed to assist that business in being carried on in a profitable way. I know railroads that have failed in business and have gone into the hands of receivers. I know banks that have failed and gone into the hands of receivers. I know farmers that have failed and gone into the hands of receivers. I know merchants who have failed and gone into the hands of receivers; but what right have these private business interests to come to the American Congress to ask assistance in carrying on their respective businesses in a successful way? Take every calling. Lawyers are often wrecked in their business, and so are merchants, and so is every business in this country. A few years ago the farmer of Kansas was not making a living, and was burning his corn for fuel; but, Mr. President, who would say that these men who have made a failure in the race for wealth ought to come to Congress and ask assistance in their business because they have made a failure? I say we are beginning a system to-day which, if ingrafted into law, will cost this country millions upon millions of dollars in the end.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. NEWLANDS addressed the Chair.

Mr. GALLINGER. I always like to yield to my friend, and will in a moment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Georgia has opened up a pretty wide avenue for discussion if we only had time for it, but we have only an hour left. The Senator called attention to the fact that somebody at some time—and I believe he quoted the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] and the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]—said that we will be building ships after awhile as cheaply as foreign governments are building them.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. That was not what I said. I said that if we gave the necessary assistance——

Mr. GALLINGER. Exactly.

Mr. FRYE. And the American merchant marine could be revived, I had no doubt but that, building ships by wholesale, we would in time build them as cheaply as they build them in England.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will repeat what I said on a former occasion, that I entered a shipyard in Philadelphia and I found on the stocks a battle ship, a cruiser, a coastwise vessel, a ferry boat, and a yacht—those five ships. Those of us who know something about mechanics are aware of the fact that there can not be any economy practised in building ships under those conditions. The Senator from Georgia, if he should go into the hat business would find it a pretty expensive matter to make one hat, but after he had made his one hat and gotten his machinery and his patterns he could make a thousand hats for a fraction of what the first hat cost. There is the difficulty in our shipbuilding.

Aside from the great advance in wages that we pay over foreign countries is the fact that we can not standardize shipbuilding. We are not building five or ten or twenty ships of the same type, where mechanics can make economies in labor and in material, but we are building ships in a desultory way in our shipyards, one of one type and another of another type. If, under those conditions, anybody has been wild enough to suggest that we are ever going to be able to build ships as cheaply as they are built on the Clyde or in Germany or France, I am certainly surprised. I do not think that anyone entertains that notion. It can not be done.

The Senator from Georgia quoted some figures—I did not understand him to say where he got them—to show that wages on American ships are not more expensive than wages on foreign ships. That refutes every——

Mr. CLAY. I said the wages of officers. I did not say wages of sailors. I think the sailors of foreign countries are not paid as highly as our sailors are.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, what the Senator says refutes every bit of testimony taken by the Merchant Marine Commission, and we have here almost a page in the index devoted to the question of wages. If the Senator would examine that testimony, he would find that every man who was qualified to give an opinion showed us conclusively that the wages of officers on American ships were from 50 to 75 and in some cases 100 per cent greater than the wages of officers on foreign ships. So that I think the contention on that point really is not worth very serious discussion.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Georgia quoted the wages paid to common sailors on American ships at $25 per month and on foreign ships at $23. On the Pacific coast they are paying now $45 for common sailors, and then they are using them as steve-dores at the port of entry and the port of clearance, and some of them make as high as $100 a month.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly. The Senator from Georgia is disturbed because this subvention or subsidy is to be taken out of the taxpayers of the country and paid to a favored class. Mr. President, that does not disturb me at all. It is precisely in the line of what we are doing in our legislation every day, and we are certainly entitled to do it if it is designed to build up American commerce, and, incidentally, to benefit the people of this country. I will show a little later that that is the inevitable result of our policy. Why, Mr. President, we have spent tens of millions of dollars in ports of the Southern States to dredge channels for foreign ships, not for American ships; we have spent tens of millions of dollars in the harbors of Baltimore, Philadelphia, Boston, and New York, in deepening them——

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator. I should have liked to have finished my sentence, but I yield.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator think that the harbor of Baltimore or the harbor of New York is local in its nature? Does it not belong to the entire country?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not any more than the commerce of the entire country—not a bit more, not so much so. I say we have spent millions of dollars in deepening our harbors. What for? To allow foreign ships to come to our docks, not for American ships. We have spent millions and millions for that purpose. Last year we spent almost $4,000,000 to light our coasts, and we got back something less than a million dollars in tonnage taxes, and that expenditure was almost entirely for foreign shipping, not for American shipping. We have spent millions of dollars—I will not undertake to say how many—to build dikes along the Mississippi River for no other reason in the world than to protect private property—and I speak advisedly when I say that—yet the Senator from Georgia and his associates did not rise up here and denounce it as an outrage that the people of the country should be taxed to build those dikes to protect private property. I will not elaborate on that point. It is only when a ship is mentioned that this contention is raised, and every time a ship is mentioned then it is denounced as an outrage and a robbery of the American people to benefit a favored class. I have not a bit of sympathy with that view, and I do not believe the Senate of the United States has very much sympathy with it.

I think, Mr. President, I will ask the privilege of the Senate—it is not my right—to occupy about ten minutes in closing the debate with some observations that I should like to make. It will not take more than ten minutes, and, after speaking a moment in regard to the value of sailing ships, I will then yield to other Senators.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator wish to go on now? There are one or two things that I should like to say, if the Senator does not wish to go on.

Mr. GALLINGER. I only desire to make a suggestion about sailing ships. It has been said that the sailing ship is not of much account and that we ought not to give any subventions to sailing ships. I shall be very brief on this point.

Mr. HALE. I will follow the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. The value of the sailing ship in training young seamen is such that some foreign governments subsidize vessels for this express work, and those governments also encourage the large steamship companies to maintain sailing vessels for this purpose.

Many of the best steamship companies require that their officers shall have served for a certain time on sailing vessels.

Most of the present school ships of the United States Navy, both for the cadets at Annapolis and the apprentices and other young seamen, are either steam vessels with large sail power or sailing vessels exclusively.

The three latest school ships for the United States Navy, built with steel hulls—the Severn, the Cumberland, and the Intrepid—are square-rigged sail vessels.

It is expected that the effect of this subvention will be to keep afloat just about enough sail vessels to train our seamen.

I was interested the other day in reading a dispatch from Bremerhaven, as follows:

> At Rickmer's shipyard here to-day there was launched the biggest sailing ship in the world. The length of the craft is 438 feet, her breadth is 54 feet, and she is of 8,000 tons burden.

Showing that in Germany they have not yet abandoned the idea of building even large sailing ships.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to say, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to state on this point that the States of Pennsylvania and New York and for all I know many of the other Atlantic seaboard States maintain sailing ships for the purpose of training seamen. Young boys are put out at an apprenticeship and educated.

Mr. GALLINGER. And it is the best school in the world for them.

Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] suggested that we ought not to subsidize sailing ships of a tonnage as low as my first amendment proposed, and I think he was right. I offered first an amendment providing that sailing vessels of 100 tons should receive the subvention. I think the amendment I offered to-day making it 200 tons is much better, and I trust it will be acceptable to the Senator.

I have looked up the number of sailing vessels on the Atlantic and Pacific oceans and will present the facts briefly.

ATLANTIC OCEAN.

Number of sail vessels engaged for 100 days or more in foreign trade during calendar year 1904	138
Number of less than 500 gross registered tons	91
Number of less than 200 gross registered tons	16
Number of less than 150 gross registered tons	4

PACIFIC OCEAN.

Number of sail vessels engaged for one hundred days or more in foreign trade during calendar year 1904	52
Number of less than 500 gross registered tons	10
Number of less than 200 gross registered tons	2
Number of less than 150 gross registered tons	0

ATLANTIC OCEAN.

Number of sail vessels engaged for one hundred and eighty days or more in foreign trade during calendar year 1904	64
Number of less than 500 gross registered tons	48
Number of less than 200 gross registered tons	8
Number of less than 150 gross registered tons	2

That exhibit shows that if we put the tonnage up to, say, 500 it will exclude almost the entire number of our sailing ships so far as the proposed subvention is concerned, and we surely do not want to do that. Putting the tonnage at 200 will save a considerable portion of our sailing ships and give them the benefit of the provisions of this bill. Now I yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, yesterday I submitted some views regarding section 6, which provides for twelve mail lines, at an annual subsidy of $2,600,000. I have since prepared a motion on that subject, which lies on the table and will come up for a vote at 5 o'clock. I wish briefly to explain the purpose of the motion.

Section 6 provides, as I have stated, for twelve mail lines, to South America, Central America, Cuba, the Philippine Islands, Australia, and other countries. The total annual subsidy provided for by this section is $2,600,000. That means for ten years a total expenditure of $26,000,000, and it means for a period of twenty years—and doubtless at the end of the period of ten years a further period of ten years will be asked—an expenditure of $52,000,000.

Now, as I understand, one of the purposes of this proposed act is to encourage the building of ships supplementary to the war ships. I understand that the average tonnage of such ships as are recommended by the General Staff of the Army is 6,500 tons, and I understand, further, that the cost of each ship with a tonnage of 6,500 is about $1,000,000. I inquired of the Senator from New Hampshire as to what number of ships would cover this entire service. His estimate was that about thirty ships would be required—less than thirty. The entire cost then of the ships to render this service would be $30,000,000, and yet we will pay in subsidy for a period of ten years $26,000,000 and in a period of twenty years $52,000,000.

I ask, when we are called upon to spend that large sum of money, whether it would not be advisable to consider the propriety of the Government ordering ships at private shipyards at a cost of $1,000,000 each, $30,000,000 in all, and of leasing those ships in time of peace to private corporations in consideration of their carrying the mail and for such further compensation as the ship companies would be willing to give, the company receiving the ship without cost, so far as capitalization is concerned, and simply obliging itself to carry the mail, and to pay such further compensation as may be agreed upon.

In this way the private companies will avoid the payment of $30,000,000 immediately in the way of capital, and all they will have to pay will be the operating expenses of the ship. These ships, according to the plan of this bill, would be operated by men employed in the naval reserve. Three thousand men would man the ships. Their pay would be three-fourths paid by the ships' lessees and one-fourth paid by the United States Government. Assuming that one-fourth would amount, on the average, to a hundred dollars per annum per man, it would mean $300,000 per annum to be paid by the United States, or if it were $150 per annum per man, it would be $450,000. The Government would thus have a force of 3,000 men whom it could call upon at any time in case of war. They could be under the discipline of naval officers, and could be trained in such a way as to suit them for service upon men-of-war, and the ships would also stand ready for the emergency of war. We have the statement of naval authorities and the statement of military authorities that it is utterly impossible to conduct the operation of the Navy without these ships and without a very large number of them; and as the merchant marine has not got them, it means, if we were attacked by any great military power, we would not have the ships supplementary to the war ships with which to conduct our naval operations.

It is a mere question of comparative cost, then, and it seems to me this bill ought to be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce with a view of its reporting to the Senate the comparative advantages of the two systems—whether the United States should obligate itself to pay these subventions, amounting to $52,000,000 in a period of twenty years, and at the end of that time own not a single stick of ship property, or whether it should expend $30,000,000 upon these ships and own them for all time.

I do not intend to go into all the economics of this question, but I do insist upon it that it is a matter for grave consideration. Inasmuch as we have not the report of the Committee on Commerce on this matter, it seems to me the bill should be recommitted to them for the purpose, in connection with this bill later on, of submitting a report upon this important question. This is not a question of Government ownership. It is not a question of the ownership of public utilities. It is simply a question of the Government constructing the ships which are absolutely essential for the service of the nation in case of war and turning them over in time of peace, with the men upon them, for the peaceful vocations of commerce.

Mr. HALE obtained the floor.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. HALE. I do.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I do not pretend to offer any suggestions with respect to the pending bill, as I am not sufficiently informed in matters marine to enlighten the Senate. But a few years ago there were gentlemen on the floor of this Chamber who said that tin could not be made in this country; that it was impossible to build up the tin industry here. The American people know what has been the history of the tin industry in this country and how many millions of dollars have been saved to the American people, to the American workmen, and to the American manufacturers by its establishment here.

Mr. President, for a few million dollars we can make the experiment under the pending bill. If we find that it is unwise, we can repeal the law, but my opinion is that in a very short time we will find the same result coming from the passage of this bill, in the building up of the shipbuilding and shipping industry of this country, that we found in the building up of the tin industry.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] is quite right, and he has furnished a very apt illustration of what can be done by the Government in the way of helping and stimulating industries. The little I have to say is suggested by the earnest appeal of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] against the subsidy. That is a very general word. It is much broader than its application to any one industry. It is the life and reviving force which the Government gives to a languishing, perhaps decayed, but hopeful, industry in order to build it up.

Forty-odd years ago the American merchant marine covered the seas of the globe—American-built ships, American-manned ships, American-sailed ships—and wherever the commerce and trade went, there the flag went on an American ship built, owned, manned, and run as an American ship. The profits of the business of the ships filled our coffers and made us prosperous.

And then mighty events, great catastrophes intervened. The country found itself engaged in a gigantic task in suppressing a rebellion, restoring and maintaining the Union, and our foreign rivals, whom we had surpassed, whom we had beaten upon the sea, most naturally seized the moment and the opportunity in every possible way to take advantage of that situation, and our shipping disappeared. The insurance companies could not afford to guarantee the freights and the voyages of American ships, and gradually our marine disappeared from the sea and our rivals—the English, later the Germans, the Norwegians—took possession of all this trade and seized upon the revenues that came from the commerce of the world and kept it away from us. And now here is an attempt to revive this languishing industry, and the Senator from Georgia is troubled, is distressed because it is, as he says, a subsidy to a particular industry, to be taken out of the Treasury of the United States, and beyond that, from the taxpayers, who pay the money and fill the Treasury.

Does not the Senator know that every contribution which the Government makes to any industry to revive it is a subsidy? The old-fashioned Democratic doctrine that there should be no intervention on the part of the Government to aid any form of industry, but that it should be left to competition and private effort, has disappeared in the ages and is no more now considered than the wildest dream of imagination of generations a thousand years ago.

We are subsidizing constantly. We are paying money from the Treasury to aid and uphold and stimulate different industries. There is not one of the appropriations of the Government, aside from the running expenses of the different Departments, that is not inherently and underlyingly a subsidy. We do it in the largest and broadest way. We do it in a munificent way for irrigation; and I am glad as an eastern man to join in the munificent gifts that we take from the Treasury for the great and beneficent scheme of irrigation in the West.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HALE. I wish the Senator would not interrupt me.

Mr. WARREN. Very well. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. I merely wished to say that I agree with what the Senator is saying as to the advisability of aiding our shipping, but I want the Senator from Maine to note the fact as he goes along that the munificent sum which he mentions as being applied to irrigation is merely a loan which is to be paid back to the Treasury of the United States in cash and in full.

Mr. HALE. Provided it be profitable; provided it pays. But life is infused into it by the benefaction of the Government. We do not anywhere appropriate from the revenues of the Government, except for its running expenses, except in the form of what is underlyingly a subsidy. We do not pay money out of the Treasury for an exposition in the State of the Senator from Georgia that is not a subsidy. It gives life to it. It never would exist, never would appear, never be above the surface but for the life that the Government infuses into it by its payment to it out of the Treasury. We do not make an appropriation, as we have done and are likely to do every year for the southern mail routes for the benefit of our southern people, that it is not a subsidy. Nobody claims that it pays, but it is the appropriation from the Government that infuses life into the enterprise and makes it a part of the operation of the Government.

There is not a river and harbor appropriation that in the old days of what I may call the "hidebound" Democracy was opposed because it was beyond the function of Government that was not a subsidy. The Senator from Maine, my colleague, in his most able and characteristic and eloquent speech showed how we had subsidized the great Gulf ports in order to enable them to obtain the commerce of the world and do business. But it was a subsidy. The Senator from New Hampshire has afforded an even more striking instance in the money we pay without grudge and most willingly for the levees upon the Mississippi to protect and maintain property there. It is a subsidy. It comes from the Treasury. It is paid by the taxpayers, and the benefit is received by a local industry. But we do it most willingly.

However, when we come to a great national industry, when we are asking to do what other nations do freely and generously, and seek to build up a great merchant marine, which is not local, but which is pervasive and a part and parcel of the Government and of the industries of the country and of the whole people, the Senator from Georgia has every indignant fiber in his body aroused because here is a subsidy from the Treasury that comes from the taxpayers to a local industry.

Mr. President, in this day, when we are considering large subjects and trying to consider them in a large way, I should like to see a rift among our Southern brethren, who are prospering and whom we are glad to help prosper because we help their industries upon a question of this kind. I should be glad to see a division, and that our friends from the South, instead of voting solidly against this bill—I hope they will not; I had almost said I believe they will not; and I hope they will not—instead of voting solidly against the attempt to revive a great national industry and an industry that will pay for itself, as the Senator from Wyoming says irrigation pays for itself, as Galveston pays for itself, as the great flood of the Mississippi that rolls majestically to the Gulf is kept in bounds by Government appropriations, and life and property are maintained in safety on its banks—as that industry is profitable, and as we contribute to it, I should like to see a division in the ranks of our friends on the other side, and that the fear which seems to haunt so many Senators that this is the one case where a wrong is being committed shall depart from their minds, and that we will go on disregarding the old hidebound theory that the Government can not infuse life and breath into the nostrils of decaying industries from the revenues in the public Treasury. We passed all that years ago and generations ago.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I feel that I should offer some explanation of the amendment which I proposed a short time ago.

I propose, on page 14, line 10, after the word "From," to strike out the words "a port" and to insert the words "each of two ports, namely, Puget Sound and the Columbia River;" and after the word "the," in the same line, to insert the word "north;" so that it will read "north Pacific coast."

My purpose, Mr. President, in offering this amendment is to insure the establishment on the north Pacific coast of two of these four lines. Really it provides for another line. Let me say it provides for one additional line. It seems to me that that is very important, in view of the fact that competing ports should be placed on an equal footing. If a port shall be supplied by a line or there should be a line running out of one port on the Pacific coast or from two ports, which lines are under a subsidy from the Government, it gives a very great advantage to that port over the others that are not thus favored.

I take it that this character of legislation has a double purpose; first, of course, to build up the shipping, to increase the number of American ships, the number of ships which carry the American flag, and as well to increase the commerce of the country. We are seeking to develop the commerce of the Orient. In order to do that, we must establish lines between this country and the oriental countries; and surely it is not unreasonable for any port or any of the principal ports on the Pacific coast to expect that if one shall be provided with a subsidized line the other may have extended to it equal facilities.

To refuse to grant this provision, it seems to me, would be in the nature of a discrimination by this Government against a port in one State in favor of a port in another State. This can be done without any disadvantage or injury to any other place.

There are provided for in the bill four lines—one from a port in the United States on the Pacific coast via Hawaii to Japan, China, and the Philippines; another from a port on the Pacific coast to Japan and China and the Philippines, omitting the requirement that they shall go via Hawaii. Then there is a line to go from a Pacific coast port via Hawaii and the Samoan Islands to Australasia, and from a port on the Pacific coast to Mexico, Central America, and the Isthmus.

If all of these subsidies shall be taken and all these lines shall be established, the provision I have offered would increase the number of lines on the Pacific coast, but that would be no disparity, it would produce no inequality, because there are seven or eight—seven I am sure, and I am not positive but that there are eight lines provided for on the Atlantic coast, including the Gulf. It would seem that it is not unreasonable to ask that five lines shall be provided for on the Pacific coast and that they shall have the benefit of all the provisions of this bill. Probably all the other lines will go out of San Francisco. The routes designated would seem to indicate that it is contemplated that the other lines shall go out of San Francisco. Therefore, I think it is nothing but justice to the two great ports in the northern Pacific to require specifically that they shall each have one line under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I shall occupy only two or three minutes. I simply rise for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senate to the way in which these demands grow. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the difference between the provisions of this bill and corresponding provisions in what was known as the "Hanna-Frye bill," which passed the Senate.

The Hanna-Frye bill, as to the subsidy of cargo ships, provided for 1 cent a mile for every hundred miles traversed by a ship of over a thousand tons. In other words, it kept the provision which gives a subsidy according to the work done. This bill proposes to give $5 a ton to a ship regardless of the number of miles traveled or the speed with which it travels or the amount of work which it has done.

But a more marked contrast, Mr. President, is found in the first section of the bill, and to that I should like to ask the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire, if he has time in his concluding remarks, so that he may tell us why there is such a great difference between the view now taken in regard to that matter and the view taken heretofore by the framers of the Hanna-Frye bill.

In the Hanna-Frye bill the only provision for bounty to seamen was a bounty to seamen engaged in the deep-sea fisheries, which are comparatively few in number, and the bounty given to them was $1 a month for the time actually employed in the voyages of the vessels in the deep-sea fisheries. There are comparatively few seamen engaged in the deep-sea fisheries.

The provision of the present bill applies not simply to the sailors engaged in the the deep-sea fisheries, but to all the sailors engaged in marine navigation, whether foreign or domestic, and, as stated by my colleague [Mr. CLAY], there are some 70,000 of them who are eligible for enrollment, and who are to receive this bonus, the amount of which I will give in a moment, at a time when they are not in the employment of the Government but altogether in the employment of private parties.

As I said, the Hanna-Frye bill gave only $1 a month to the few sailors who were engaged in the deep-sea fisheries. The present bill gives the bounty, which I shall read, to all officers, petty officers, and seamen engaged in the entire marine navigation, foreign and domestic, there being of those eligible for such bounty some 70,000 men. Now, instead of $1 a month to the few, this is what is given to the many. I will just read the provision that states the amount which is to be paid to this vast army of men, not all of them of course, but there are 70,000 of them eligible to receive the amounts of bounty, which I now read, found on page 4, beginning at line 14:

For each officer of the line or Engineer Corps, having the rank of lieutenant of the naval reserve, $110—

That is over $9 a month—

for each officer of the line of Engineer Corps, having the rank of lieutenant (junior grade) in the naval reserve, $90; for each officer of the line or Engineer Corps, having the rank of ensign in the naval reserve, $80; for each man with a rating of chief petty officer, $70; for each man with a rating of petty officer, first class, $60; for each man with a rating of petty officer, second class, $48; for each man with a rating of petty officer, third class, $40; for each seaman, first class, $36; for each seaman, second class, $30; for each seaman, third class, $24.

Mr. President, I will not occupy the time of the Senate, as doubtless other Senators will desire to say a word, but I thought it was proper that that consideration should be presented to the Senate.

I will simply say, in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Maine, while there is a great deal I should like to say in response, that so far as the latter part of the bill is concerned, which proposes by liberal mail compensation, or mail subsidy, if that term is preferred, to open new lines of communication between ports of the United States and foreign ports where we now have no lines of communication, that much of the bill I would with pleasure support, and I believe there are many others on this side of the Chamber who would also support a bill of that kind if so limited; and I have, for the purpose of endeavoring, if possible, to have a bill to which I can give my support, offered an amendment which strikes out the first four sections of the pending bill and which would leave that much of the bill which I have just indicated.

Mr. GALLINGER obtained the floor.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit me a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of resolutions adopted by the Sailors' Union of the Pacific coast on this measure that were sent to me from San Francisco.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolutions will be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAILORS' UNION OF THE PACIFIC,
San Francisco, Cal., February 6, 1906.

Hon. T. M. PATTERSON,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: By instructions of the Sailors' Union of the Pacific, I inclose herewith copy of resolutions adopted by that organization on February 5 relative to Senate bill No. 529, otherwise known as the "ship subsidy bill," and request your consideration of the same.

Respectfully, yours,

E. ELLISON, Secretary pro tempora.

Whereas there is now pending in the Senate of the United States Congress a bill designated S. 529, the purposes of which are "to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage;" and

Whereas said bill (S. 529) would, if enacted into law, affect the interests of American seamen to their serious injury by virtue of the provisions contained in sections 1, 6, and 7 of said bill (S. 529), inasmuch as these sections, while purporting to create a force of naval volunteers upon a basis of voluntary enrollment on the part of the seamen, would in practice make such enrollment compulsory, thus creating a system of conscription, since in order to secure employment on vessels deriving benefit under the terms of the said bill (S. 529) the seamen would be compelled to voluntarily (?) enroll themselves in the naval volunteers; and

Whereas the general features of the said bill (S. 529) affords no assurance of accomplishing the objects sought, namely, improvement in the material and personnel of the American merchant marine, but, on the contrary, are destined to impose upon the public additional burdens for the exclusive benefit of certain classes: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Sailors' Union of the Pacific, That we are opposed to the passage of the said bill (S. 529); further

Resolved, That we hereby urge upon the Congress of the United States the enactment of such legislative measures, now pending in that body, as are calculated to remedy the defects in the navigation laws, particularly such as bear upon the personnel of the American merchant marine, to the end that the objects sought by Senate bill 529 may be achieved by legitimate and direct means which shall appeal to and meet with the approval of the American people, reviving in them a personal interest and pride in maritime affairs, without which the profession of the sea and all that appertains thereto must continue in the present state of public indifference and contempt; further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to the proper quarters, with an urgent request for consideration thereof.

Adopted by the Sailors' Union of the Pacific, February 5, 1906.

E. ELLISON, Secretary.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield for two minutes.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to say only a word in regard to the amendment proposed by my friend from Oregon [Mr. FULTON]. I observe that the provision of the bill which provides for the establishment of new steamship lines mentions ports on the Atlantic coast, ports on the Gulf of Mexico, and ports on the Pacific coast. I think it would be ill advised for us to designate any particular port on the Pacific coast, for certainly the enterprise of the people of Oregon and Portland——

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. GALLINGER. I can not yield for a colloquy.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator from California if he is afraid that San Francisco will not secure one of these lines?

Mr. PERKINS. It would only be a just tribute to their enterprise——

Mr. FULTON. Or does he want San Francisco to secure all of them?

Mr. PERKINS. It is only a just tribute to the enterprise of the merchants of San Francisco should they do so. But the same privilege is accorded to Oregon, to Washington, to the ports of Puget Sound.

One word more. I wish to say, for the Senator from New Hampshire yielded only two minutes, in reply to what the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] said in offering the amendment proposing discriminating duties, he has overlooked the thought that the main object of this bill is to build up trade with other countries where we now have no commercial trade, especially in South America, and that 90 per cent of the goods coming from South America are on the free list—coffee, logwood, and such articles of trade as come from that country. Therefore the 10 per cent discriminating duty would give us no benefit, no relief whatever.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish to say that the Merchant Marine Commission and the Committee on Commerce planned these new lines as they thought upon an equitable basis, and if each Senator who has a port in his State or city that he wants to take care of is going to get a new line, I think we will have a bill that will be rather top-heavy.

In reply to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], who says that the Frye shipping bill only included the deep-sea fisheries, I would suggest that that bill did not propose to create a naval reserve, and that is the reason why we have broadened that provision. There is no danger of getting too many naval-reserve men. England has nearly four times as many sailors as we have; she has been a good many years in getting 33,500 men; and if we ever get 10,000 we will be fortunate.

Now, Mr. President, a word in closing this debate. In Rhodes's History of the United States, volume 3, page 7, the following will be found as an utterance by Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, in November, 1860, on the eve of secession, delivered before the Georgia legislature. Mr. Stephens said:

We have now an amount of shipping, not only coastwise, but to foreign countries, which puts us in the front rank of the nations of the world. England can no longer by styled the mistress of the seas. What American is not proud of the result?

Twenty-one years after that Mr. Blaine, in the last speech he made in this body, called attention to the fact that during twenty years from the close of the war we had not done a single, identical thing for the shipping interests of the country. He said:

During these years in which Congress has not stepped forward to do one thing for the foreign commerce of this country, for all that vast external transportation whose importance the Senator from Kentucky has not exaggerated, but has strongly depicted, the same Congress has passed ninety-two acts in aid of internal transportation by rail; has given 200,000,000 acres of the public lands, worth to-day a thousand million dollars in money, and has added $70,000,000 in cash, and yet, I repeat, it has extended the aid of scarcely a single dollar to build up our foreign commerce.

Mr. President, there are the two pictures—the picture that Alexander H. Stephens painted in 1860; the picture that Mr. Blaine painted in this body in 1881—which, in view of the present condition of the American merchant marine, is only emphasized.

There are two or three points I want to call attention to. One is a letter from Mr. A. A. Eberson, of St. Louis, who recently established a manufacturing plant in London. Mr. Eberson was asked why he did that, and he made this reply:

Under existing conditions as to shipping possibilities in the United States, I believe there is more money for us to manufacture for export in England than here. You can go to any wharf in London and see English ships bringing freight from all ports of the world, and you can send your goods out from English ports in those same ships. You manufacture in the United States and look for American ships to take your goods and you do not find them. If you want to freight by ships, you must turn to foreigners. That's something for the opponents of the American ship-subsidy bill to think about. It is a fact that has determined more than one American manufacturer to establish plants in England, for we are not the only ones who are going over there.

My attention was called the other day to a translation from a French paper, the Revue des deux Mondes, of Paris. The translation is as follows, and it relates to this bill:

Once capital becomes engaged in the new enterprise, once American daring has been applied to solve this new problem, it will not be long before the United States will have results. Half a century ago the United States had the second merchant marine of the world. That great country has not degenerated since, the resources of its territory have multiplied in a prodigious fashion, and its firm determination to return to a competitive navigation shows this clearly.

Here is cause for thought for European shipowners. A new competitor, particularly redoubtable, will soon rise before them; a powerful merchant marine is on the eve of being created for the service of an immense country, provided with a magnificent seacoast, bathed by both oceans, already rich, but richer still in energy, vigor, and resources still unbounded, even greater than its acquired riches.

That is the opinion of a distinguished Frenchman regarding the possibilities of this bill.

I received a letter the other day from a gentleman in New York. He is a manufacturer and not an exporter, and he has taken great interest in this matter. I want to read just one paragraph from his letter. He called my attention to the fact, and stated that I had not sufficiently emphasized it, that the resultant effects of this legislation would benefit every American citizen in every State of the American Union, and that the reward which would come in the general welfare in building up the interests of the American people everywhere would be tenfold or a hundredfold greater than the expense to the Government. He said:

In building our own ships we are consuming our own raw materials and utilizing our own labor; we are adding new business to transportation interests on land and water; we are creating new industries for marine manufactures amounting to millions of dollars per annum, and, finally, we are producing five new distinct labor wage interests from raw materials, transportation, shipbuilding, marine service, and the secondary stage of the resultant effects of expending labor wages for the products of other industries. These interests together return not less than one hundredfold the cost of the net subventions, and, in my opinion, it will probably, by close calculation, approximate nearer one hundred and twenty-five times the cost of subventions when we finally possess an adequate merchant marine for our exports and imports. All these facts are exceedingly plain to scientific economists, and in my conversation with masters of these subjects, there has not been a dissenting voice.

Mr. President, I was very much gratified in looking up some facts on this subject to find an extract from a speech that the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] made in Clinton, Iowa, October 10, 1903, showing that the Senator, however he may feel about this bill, is in profound sympathy with the purpose for which some of us have been laboring. I think I will quote the Senator correctly when I say that he said:

Our efforts should be turned to these countries lying near us, as well as to South America and Asia. The latter field is likely to be of inestimable value in the near future, stimulated as it has been by the presence of our flag in those distant seas, where three-fifths of the population of the globe is to be supplied in the future with the products of the more civilized nations.

In this struggle we will have the active and close competition of Europe. We have advantage in distance, and will soon have, if we have not now, the advantage in facilities. American ships must float there, and the American flag must be seen there and dwell there, and our Government can well afford to provide special aid to our merchant marine to extend our trade there, and in South Africa and South America as well.

A magnificent speech!

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I am much obliged to the Senator for that valuable contribution to the remarks he is now making.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thought it was valuable.

Now, Mr. President, I want to close by reading an editorial from the New York Sun, which I think sums up this entire question better than it has been summed up by all the speeches made on this subject except that made by my distinguished friend the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. The New York Sun says:

Why should Senators waste time over the question whether the Gallinger bill for the restoration of the American ship to its old place on the ocean is a subsidy or a bounty, or a measure analogous to the land reclamation act, or what not?

Open the way for the American flag to its proper place at the front of the world's carrying trade, and call it a subsidy or by any other name.

Redeem our one great national failure, and call the redemption fee a bounty or by any other name.

Rehabilitate the American merchant marine and compare the process to the land reclamation legislation or to anything else in sight.

The people are not afraid of the word "subsidy," or of any other word that may be used to describe the method of assuring that restoration and revival which President Roosevelt had in view when he said to Congress:

"To the spread of our trade in peace and the defense of our flag in war a great and prosperous merchant marine is indispensable. We should have ships of our own and seamen of our own to convey our goods to neutral markets, and in case of need to reenforce our battle line."

Let us have them. Let the lack of them no longer disgrace this nation.

Mr. President, the hour for voting has arrived, and only a single further word. I want to return thanks to my associates in this body for the kind consideration they have accorded me in my advocacy of this bill. I know how inadequate it has been, but it was a great question projected upon some of us who perhaps were not well equipped for its consideration. However, we have given conscientious, earnest, faithful effort to the subject, and we have offered a bill which we feel sure if enacted into law will do something for the benefit not of one section of this great country of ours, but the entire country.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There are but fifty copies of the reprint of the bill here. More copies are expected soon. The Secretary will report the first amendment proposed.

The SECRETARY. On page 3 of the reprint, amendment by Mr. GALLINGER——

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. LODGE. On page 1.

Mr. FRYE. We must vote to perfect the text before voting to strike out.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

The SECRETARY. On page 3 of the bill, line 23, strike out the words "deep sea."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Next amendment, by Mr. GALLINGER, on page 3, line 24, after the words "United States," insert the following words:

Including the coastwise trade of the Atlantic and Pacific and the Great Lakes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will report the amendments in the order in which they appear in the bill.

The SECRETARY. By Mr. ALLISON, on page 4, line 15, after the words "proper audit," insert the words "by the Auditor for the Navy Department."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Also by Mr. ALLISON, on page 4, line 17, after the word "money," strike out the words "in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated" and insert:

To be annually appropriated therefor upon estimates to be annually submitted to Congress in the Book of Estimates.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. By Mr. GALLINGER, on page 4, line 22, before the word "fisheries," strike out the words "deep sea."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Also by Mr. GALLINGER, on page 4, line 23, after the word "fisheries" insert:

Including the coastwise trade of the Atlantic and Pacific and the Great Lakes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. By Mr. ALLISON, on page 5, line 15, after the word "certificate" strike out the words "by an officer to be designated."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Also, by Mr. ALLISON, on page 5, line 20, before the word "that," strike out the words "Commissioner of Navigation" and insert "Secretary of Commerce and Labor."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. By Mr. GALLINGER, on page 6, line 5, after the word "above," at the end of the paragraph, insert the words:

The total number of officers, petty officers, and men enrolled in the naval reserve shall not at any time exceed 10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. By Mr. ALLISON, on page 6, line 14, after the word "Treasury," strike out the words "not otherwise appropriated" and insert "to be annually appropriated therefor upon estimates to be annually submitted to Congress in the Book of Estimates."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 18, after the word "vessel," it is proposed by Mr. ALLISON to insert the words "of over 500 gross registered tons."

Mr. GALLINGER. Instead of that amendment I have offered an amendment as a substitute relating to the tonnage of vessels.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is an amendment in lines 19 and 20?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I offered it this morning.

Mr. FRYE. As a substitute for the Allison amendment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. I will offer a substitute for the amendment in print, before the word "vessel," in line 18, page 6, and after the word "any," to insert "steam vessel of over 1,000 gross tons and of any sail vessel of over 200 gross tons." I offer that as a substitute for the amendment which I offered yesterday, which has just been read by the Secretary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa offers in place of the amendment heretofore offered by him, on page 6, an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 18, after the word "any," it is proposed to insert "steam vessel of over 1,000 gross tons and of any sail vessel of over 200 gross tons."

Mr. GALLINGER. I offered an amendment this morning, which seems to have gotten lost. I move to add to the amendment just stated "and fishing vessel not exceeding 20 gross tons."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the amendment of Mr. ALLISON the words "and fishing vessel not exceeding 20 gross tons."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment was one offered by Mr. GALLINGER, on page 7, to strike out from line 22 to the end of line 4, on page 8, inclusive, as follows:

The subventions provided for in this section shall not be paid to a vessel for a voyage on which the principal part in bulk of her cargo shall have been transported from one port of the United States to another port of the United States, as provided in section 4347 of the Revised Statutes as amended by the acts of February 15, 1893, and February 17, 1898.

And in lieu thereof insert:

The subventions provided for in this section shall not be paid to—

(a) A vessel for a voyage on which the principal part in bulk of her cargo shall have been transported from one port of the United States to another port of the United States, as provided in section 4347 of the Revised Statutes as amended by the acts of February 15, 1893, and February 17, 1898.

(b) A vessel while exclusively employed in carrying between foreign ports.

(c) A vessel for a voyage extending only to a foreign port less than 150 nautical miles from her last port of departure in the United States, or from a foreign port less than 150 nautical miles from her first port of arrival in the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment submitted by Mr. GALLINGER was, at the top of page 9, to insert:

(d) A steam vessel of less than 500 tons gross register or sail vessel of less than 200 tons gross register engaged in the foreign trade, or a vessel of less than 20 tons gross register engaged in the deep-sea fisheries.

Mr. FRYE. That is to be disagreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will withdraw that part of the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Then the amendment will be considered as rejected.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is, in section 3, on page 10, line 10, by Mr. GALLINGER, after the word "vessel," to strike out "then the same shall be determined," and insert:

The United States is hereby authorized and empowered to take the vessel at once, leaving the fair actual value or fair rate of hire to be determined thereafter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment proposed by Mr. GALLINGER is, in the same section, on page 10, line 17, after the word "agree," to insert:

And the provisions of this subdivision shall be embodied in every contract between the vessel owner or owners and the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment, proposed by Mr. GALLINGER, is on page 11, line 3, after the words "of the," to insert the words "navigating force on;" in line 4, after the word "deck," to strike out "force;" in line 7, after the word "experience," to strike out "at sea;" and in line 8, after the word "deck," to insert "at sea or on the Great Lakes;" so as to read:

Third. That upon each departure of said vessel from the United States at least one-sixth of the crew shall be citizens of the United States, or men who have declared their intention to become citizens, and of the navigating force on deck, excluding licensed officers, at least one-half shall be able seamen, who are hereby defined to be men who have had two years' or more experience on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is one proposed by Mr. ALLISON, in section 4, on page 12, line 14, after the word "time," to strike out "but no vessel shall receive a subvention under the provisions of section 2 of this act for a longer period than ten years."

Mr. GALLINGER. That was heretofore agreed to. There are certain other amendments agreed to that I think ought not to be again read.

Mr. SPOONER. Then the words which have been read are stricken out?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is one proposed by Mr. MALLORY, in section 6, on page 15, to strike out from line 13 to line 17, inclusive, as follows:

Fifth. From a port of the United States on the Gulf of Mexico to Cuba, on steamships of the United States of not less than 14 knots speed, for a semiweekly service at a maximum compensation not exceeding $75,000 a year.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Fifth. From a port of the United States on the Atlantic coast, south of Cape Hatteras, and from a port on the Gulf of Mexico to Cuba, on steamships of the United States of not less than 14 knots speed, for a weekly service, at a maximum compensation not exceeding $75,000 a year, or for a semiweekly service at a maximum compensation not exceeding $125,000 a year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is one proposed by Mr. MORGAN, in section 6, page 16, after the word "From," to strike out "a port" and insert "each of two ports;" after the word "Mexico," in line 4, to insert "and from New Orleans;" and in line 6, after the words "Central America and," to insert "to the port of Cristobal on;" so as to read:

Sixth. From each of two ports of the United States on the Gulf of Mexico and from New Orleans to Central America and to the port of Cristobal on the Isthmus of Panama, on steamships of the United States of not less than 12 knots speed, for a weekly service at a maximum compensation not exceeding $75,000 a year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is one proposed by Mr. FULTON, on page 17, line 8, after the word "From," to strike out "a port" and insert "each of two ports, namely, Puget Sound and the Columbia River;" and in line 10, before the word "Pacific," to insert the word "North;" so as to read:

Tenth. From each of two ports, namely, Puget Sound and the Columbia River, of the North Pacific coast of the United States to Japan, China, and the Philippines, on steamships of the United States of not less than 13 knots speed, for a monthly service at a maximum compensation not exceeding $210,000 a year; or for a fortnightly service, at a maximum compensation not exceeding $420,000 a year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FULTON. To perfect the amendment, I move, in line 13, after the word "compensation," to insert the words "to each."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, after the words "maximum compensation," it is proposed to insert the words "to each."

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that be submitted to the Senate, Mr. President.

Mr. FULTON. And I offer the same amendment to come in in line 15.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, line 13, after the words "maximum compensation," it is proposed to insert "to each;" and in line 15, after the words "maximum compensation," to insert "to each."

The amendment was rejected.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is one proposed by Mr. MORGAN, on page 18, line 5, before the words "the Isthmus of Panama," to insert "Port la Boca on;" so as to read:

Twelfth. From a port of the Pacific coast of the United States to Mexico, Central America, and Port la Boca on the Isthmus of Panama, on steamships of the United States of not less than 12 knots speed, for a fortnightly service at a maximum compensation not exceeding $120,000 a year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is one proposed by Mr. GALLINGER, on page 21, after line 6, to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 12. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act, in whole or in part, whenever in its judgment the public interest shall so require, without, however, impairing in any wise the obligation of any specific contract then in force which shall have been entered into under the provisions of sections 2, 3, 5, and 6 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer an amendment, on page 10, line 25, after the first word "That," to insert "until July 1, 1912;" so as to read:

Third. That until July 1, 1912, upon each departure of said vessel from the United States at least one-sixth of the crew shall be citizens of the United States, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer another amendment in the same section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the same paragraph, on page 11, line 1, after the word "one-sixth," it is proposed to insert "and after July 1, 1912, one-fourth."

Mr. SPOONER. Where is that in the new print of the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the new print it will be found at the top of page 11. The amendment will be again stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 1, after the word "one-sixth," it is proposed to insert "and after July 1, 1912, one-fourth;" so that if amended it will read:

Upon each departure of said vessel from the United States at least one-sixth, and after July 1, 1912, one-fourth, of the crew shall be citizens of the United States, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment heretofore submitted by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], to strike out all of sections 1, 2, 3, and 4 of the bill.

Mr. BACON. At the request of some Senators, I will ask that the vote upon that amendment be divided, so that it shall be taken upon the first section alone and then upon the second, third, and fourth sections, the second, third, and fourth sections all relating to one matter and the first section relating to a separate matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia will be divided. The first question is on the amendment to strike out section 1.

Mr. BACON. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOPKINS. Some of us have not the bill under consideration as it is now printed, and I should like to have the section proposed to be striken out read, so that we may know upon what we are voting.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the section proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. BACON. I understand that the amendment offered by the committee to the first section has been adopted, so that the section to be read is really the amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. LODGE. All that it is necessary to read is the amendment.

Mr. BACON. The amendment has been accepted and stands in lieu of the original section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The section will be read as it stands amended.

The Secretary read the section proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

That there shall be enrolled, in such manner and under such requirements as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, from the officers and men now and hereafter employed in the merchant marine and fisheries of the United States, including the coastwise trade of the Atlantic and Pacific and the Great Lakes, such officers, petty officers, and men as may be capable of rendering service as members of a naval reserve, for duty in time of war, and who are willing to undertake such service, to be classified in grades and ratings according to their capacity as shown at time of enrollment. No man shall be thus enrolled who is not a citizen of the United States either by birth or naturalization. These members of the naval reserve shall be enrolled for a period of four years, during which period they shall be subject to render service on call of the President in time of war. They shall also possess such qualifications, receive such instruction, and be subject to such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, upon proper audit by the Auditor for the Navy Department, to pay, out of any money to be annually appropriated therefor upon estimates to be annually submitted to Congress in the Book of Estimates, to each officer, petty officer, or man thus enrolled and employed in the merchant marine or fisheries, including the coastwise trade of the Atlantic and Pacific and the Great Lakes as hereinafter provided, an annual retainer as follows:

For each officer of the line or Engineer Corps, having the rank of lieutenant of the naval reserve, $110; for each officer of the line or Engineer Corps, having the rank of lieutenant (junior grade) in the naval reserve, $90; for each officer of the line or Engineer Corps, having the rank of ensign in the naval reserve, $80; for each man with a rating of chief petty officer, $70; for each man with a rating of petty officer, first class, $60; for each man with a rating of petty officer, second class, $48; for each man with a rating of petty officer, third class, $40; for each seaman, first class, $36; for each seaman, second class, $30; for each seaman, third class, $24. Such retainer shall be paid at the end of each year of service on certificate, by the Secretary of the Navy, that the member of the naval reserve has satisfactorily complied with the regulations, and on certificate by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that such member has served satisfactorily for at least six months of the preceding twelve months on vessels of the United States in the merchant marine or in the deep-sea fisheries. Each officer, petty officer, or man of the naval reserve thus enrolled, who has not served for six months of the preceding year on vessels of the United States in the merchant marine, or in the deep-sea fisheries, but has complied with the other prescribed requirements for enrollment in the naval reserve, shall receive one-half the annual retainer as enumerated above. The total number of officers, petty officers, and men enrolled in the naval reserve shall not at any time exceed 10,000.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is necessarily absent. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FLINT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). The junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE] is paired with the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON]. The junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. A transfer of those pairs has been made, leaving the Senator from Colorado and myself at liberty to vote. I shall not make this announcement again. I vote "nay."

Mr. TALIAFERRO (when Mr. MALLORY's name was called). My colleague [Mr. MALLORY] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He has a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR].

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when Mr. PROCTOR's name was called). My colleague [Mr. PROCTOR] is unavoidably absent from the Senate to-day, and will not be able to be present during any of the votes this afternoon. He has a pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY]. I shall make no further announcement of his pair.

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], who is absent. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] is absent unpaired. I transfer the pair existing between the Senator from Tennessee and myself to the Senator from Pennsylvania, so that they will be paired with each other. I do not know how either would vote, if present, but I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], who is detained from the Chamber by illness. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BEVERIDGE (after voting in the negative). I did not observe when I voted that the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. CLARK], with whom I have a pair, is absent. Inasmuch as he is absent, I withdraw my vote. I hope this announcement will serve for the remaining votes on the bill.

Mr. ELKINS. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay" on the pending amendment. I desire to announce that I am in favor of the bill and the Senator from Texas is opposed to it. I make this announcement of my pair to serve during the remaining votes to be taken on the bill and amendments.

Mr. TELLER. The junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] left the Senate to go to the hospital, where he has a sick son. He desired that I should say that he is against the bill, and I make that statement now at his request.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to state that I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY]. That pair has been transferred to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BULKELEY], so that they stand paired. That announcement will stand for all the votes on the bill.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 39, as follows:

So Mr. BACON's amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs upon the second division of the motion of the Senator from Georgia to strike out sections 2, 3, and 4 of the bill.

Mr. BACON. I do not deem it necessary to call for the yeas and nays, as the last roll call may be regarded as a test vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Georgia to strike out sections 2, 3, and 4.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I proposed certain amendments which the Clerk has printed before him. I ask that they may be acted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that the amendments of the Senator from Alabama were printed separately, but, through some inadvertence, were not sent to the Printing Office to be incorporated in the bill. They will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 15 of the last print, in clause 5, line 20, after the word "port," insert the words "or ports;" so as to read:

From a port of the United States on the Atlantic coast, south of Cape Hatteras, and from a port or ports on the Gulf of Mexico to Cuba, etc.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 22, page 15, it is proposed to strike out the word "fourteen," before the word "knots," and to insert "sixteen;" so as to read: "not less than sixteen knots speed."

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, line 23, after the words "not exceeding," it is proposed to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "one hundred and fifty;" so as to read, "at a maximum compensation not exceeding $150,000 a year."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PATTERSON. I sent an amendment to the desk while the argument was in progress, and I should like to have a vote on it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section to the bill as follows:

SEC. —. No subvention, compensation, or subsidy provided for in this act shall be paid for any steamship or other ship that carries any Chinese as part of its deck force or crew.

Mr. PATTERSON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ELKINS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] on the bill and on all the amendments. I will make no further announcement on the subject. If the Senator from Texas were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay" on this amendment; and he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea" on the passage of the bill.

Mr. FLINT (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. I understand he will not be here this afternoon, and I therefore make this announcement as to all votes which may follow. If free to vote, I should vote "nay" on this amendment, and on the passage of the bill itself I should vote "yea" and the Senator from Mississippi "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 17, nays—47, as follows:

YEAS—17.

Ankeny	Fulton	Nixon	Teller
Carter	Gearin	Patterson	Warner
Daniel	La Follette	Perkins
Dubois	McLaurin	Piles
Foster	Newlands	Rayner

NAYS—47.

Aldrich	Crane	Heyburn	Penrose
Allee	Dick	Hopkins	Pettus
Allison	Dolliver	Kean	Platt
Bacon	Dryden	Latimer	Scott
Blackburn	Foraker	Lodge	Simmons
Brandegee	Frazier	Long	Smoot
Burkett	Frye	McCreary	Spooner
Burnham	Gallinger	McCumber	Stone
Burrows	Gamble	Millard	Sutherland
Clark, Wyo.	Hale	Morgan	Taliaferro
Clarke, Ark.	Hansbrough	Nelson	Wetmore
Clay	Hemenway	Overman

NOT VOTING—25.

Alger	Clapp	Flint	Money
Bailey	Clark, Mont.	Gorman	Proctor
Berry	Culberson	Kittredge	Tillman
Beveridge	Cullom	Knox	Warren
Bulkeley	Depew	McEnery
Burton	Dillingham	Mallory
Carmack	Elkins	Martin

So Mr. PATTERSON'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPOONER. I move to strike out of the first section all after line 23, on page 5, up to and including the word "above," on page 6, line 5.

Mr. BACON. Some of us have not had an opportunity to get the new print, and I will ask the Senator to read what it is proposed to strike out, so that we may know.

Mr. SPOONER. I will read it:

Each officer, petty officer, or man of the naval reserve thus enrolled, who has not served for six months of the preceding year on vessels of the United States in the merchant marine, or in the deep-sea fisheries, but has complied with the other prescribed requirements for enrollment in the naval reserve, shall receive one-half the annual retainer as enumerated above.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the Senate having refused to strike out the amendment upon motion of the Senator from Georgia, the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin is not in order while the bill is in Committee of the Whole, but will be in order when the bill goes into the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. McLAURIN. I offered an amendment this morning which has not been printed. I ask for a vote upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi offers an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That no part of the subsidy by this act provided for shall be paid to any Senator or Representative in Congress, or member of the executive or judiciary department, or to any member of the family of any such Senator, Representative, member of the executive or judiciary department; or to any corporation of which such Senator, Representative, member of the executive or judiciary department or member of the family of such Senator, Representative, member of the executive or judiciary department shall own or shall have owned, in his or her or any other name, any of the stock.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion to lay the amendment on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. I offer an amendment to come in at the close of section 11.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 11, after the words "nineteen hundred and six," the following:

And shall remain of force for ten years thereafter, after which period it shall cease to be of force and effect.

Mr. BACON. Upon the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the amendment may be again stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. Section 11 now reads:

SEC. 11. That this act shall take effect on July 1, 1906.

It is proposed to add thereto the words:

And shall remain of force for ten years thereafter, after which period it shall cease to be of force and effect.

Mr. BACON. Senators around me say that it is unnecessary to call for the yeas and nays unless the viva voce vote shall disclose the necessity for it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 4 of the new print, line 21, I move to strike out "enrolled" and insert "enlisted;" the same on page 3, line 20, and wherever the word occurs in the section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is out of order at this time, but will be in order when the bill reaches the Senate, and for the same reason as heretofore stated.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like a vote upon the motion to recommit.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada submits a motion to recommit with instructions, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce, with instructions to report in connection therewith an estimate of the cost of the vessels required for service in the ocean mail lines, provided for in section 6, and as to whether it is practicable for the United States Government to construct such ships as a part of the Navy, supplementary to the war ships, to be used as colliers, transports, scouts, etc., in the emergency of war, and as to whether it is practicable to lease such ships to private corporations in times of peace for the service of the mail lines contemplated in section 6, and as to whether it is practicable to organize a naval reserve to be enlisted in the United States in the service of such ships whose wages shall be paid three-fourths by the private corporations leasing such ships and one-fourth by the United States Government; such naval reserves to be composed of citizens of the United States or of those who have declared their intention to become such, and to be subject to the training of naval officers in order to fit them to respond to the call of the Government in case of war, and the rentals received from such ships to form a fund for the gradual enlargement of the number of supplementary ships required by the Navy in case of war as colliers, transports, scouts, etc., and generally to report the comparative cost of such method of enlarging our merchant marine as compared with the method of subvention provided by section 6.

Mr. NEWLANDS. On the question of agreeing to the motion, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TELLER. If it be in order to divide the proposition and to take a vote first on the simple question of recommitting the bill, I ask that we may take a vote on the question of recommitting the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I know this is not debatable, but it seems to me this is a straight proposition to recommit with instructions, and therefore is not divisible.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, debate is not in order at this time.

Mr. TELLER. I am not trying to debate it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A motion to recommit with instructions is not divisible.

Mr. HALE. That is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada asks for the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit with instructions. Is there a second? In the opinion of the Chair there is not. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nevada to recommit the bill with instructions.

The motion was not agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments proposed the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPOONER. Have the amendments been concurred in in the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They have not.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator can reserve any one he wishes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin is at liberty to reserve any of the amendments which he desires to have acted upon separately.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish to have a vote upon all the amendments which I offered as in Committee of the Whole. I offered them seasonably and a record of them was made at the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments will be stated in their order.

Mr. SPOONER. I can indicate the first one. I move to strike out, beginning on the twenty-fourth line, on page 5 of the new print, the following words:

Each officer, petty officer, or man of the naval reserve thus enrolled, who has not served for six months of the preceding year on vessels of the United States in the merchant marine, or in the deep-sea fisheries, but has complied with the other prescribed requirements for enrollment in the naval reserve, shall receive one-half the annual retainer as enumerated above.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to have the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary having called the roll, the result was announced—yeas 34, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—34.

Allison	Dolliver	Latimer	Rayner
Ankeny	Dubois	McCreary	Simmons
Bacon	Foster	McLaurin	Spooner
Blackburn	Frazier	Morgan	Stone
Burkett	Fulton	Newlands	Taliaferro
Burrows	Gamble	Overman	Teller
Clarke, Ark.	Gearin	Patterson	Warner
Clay	Hemenway	Pettus
Daniel	La Follette	Piles

NAYS—30.

Aldrich	Dryden	Kean	Perkins
Allee	Foraker	Lodge	Platt
Brandegee	Frye	Long	Scott
Burnham	Gallinger	McCumber	Smoot
Carter	Hale	Millard	Sutherland
Clark, Wyo.	Hansbrough	Nelson	Wetmore
Crane	Heyburn	Nixon
Dick	Hopkins	Penrose

NOT VOTING—25.

Alger	Clapp	Flint	Money
Bailey	Clark, Mont.	Gorman	Proctor
Berry	Culberson	Kittredge	Tillman
Beveridge	Cullom	Knox	Warren
Bulkeley	Depew	McEnery
Burton	Dillingham	Mallory
Carmack	Elkins	Martin

So Mr. SPOONER's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. I move to insert after the word "citizens" in subdivision third, page 11, the proviso which I send to the desk. I shall not take the time to ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11 of the last print, line 3, after the word "citizens," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That except in the case of steamers navigating rivers exclusively at least 75 per cent of the navigating crew, exclusive of licensed officers, shall be individually effective hands—that is, of a rating not less than able seamen, and no one shall be signed as an able seaman unless he shall be 19 or more years of age and shall have served at least three years on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Wisconsin to demand the yeas and nays?

Mr. SPOONER. No, sir; I did not. I will take the viva voce of the Senate on the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPOONER. I move to strike out subdivision 6, on page 11.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated by the Secretary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that lines 24 and 25 have been stricken out on motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to move to insert the word "enlisted" wherever the word "enrolled" is found in that section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that lines 24 and 25, at the bottom of page 5, down to and including the word "above," in line 5, at the top of page 6, were stricken out on motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. ALLISON. The word "enrolled" has been stricken out?

Mr. KEAN. The entire language was stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The entire language.

Mr. GALLINGER. Down to the amendment I offered.

Mr. ALLISON. If that has already been stricken out, with a great many other things, I do not object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator move to strike out the word "enrolled," in line 7, page 6?

Mr. ALLISON. If that is still there, I move to strike it out. All I want is simply to have it appear that I moved these amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6 of the last print, line 7, strike out the first word in the line, the word "enrolled," and insert in lieu the word "enlisted."

The amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall the bill pass?

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I read from the Washington Post of this morning's issue the following. The headline is:

SCORES PROPOSED AUTO LAW.

"A man who would father such a bill as that now before Congress for the regulation of automobiles in Washington," said Robert B. Caverly, captain of the Automobile Club, last night, "would have trouble keeping out of the way of himself——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend. The Chair is desirous of hearing what the gentleman from Tennessee says, and can not because the House is not in order. Will the gentleman from Tennessee please read again?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I will send it to the Clerk's desk and have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SCORES PROPOSED AUTO LAW—CAPTAIN CAVERLY OF THE LOCAL CLUB SAYS SIMS BILL IS RIDICULOUS—CHAUFFEUR, HE DECLARES, WOULD HAVE TO CARRY CHART IN ONE HAND AND RUN MACHINE WITH THE OTHER.

"A man who would father such a bill as that now before Congress for the regulation of automobiles in Washington," said Robert B. Caverly, captain of the Automobile Club, last night, "would have trouble keeping out of the way of himself. With all due respect to Representative SIMS, of Tennessee, who introduced the bill, I would say the measure is ridiculous in half a dozen ways.

"The idea of running an automobile 12 miles an hour and slowing down to 8 miles an hour at every corner is laughable, and the idea of running at specific rates of speed on certain streets at designated times, as provided in the bill, is amusing. A man would have to carry a chart in one hand and keep the other busy following out the rules. The chances are he would kill half a dozen citizens before he could get back home.

"That part of the bill providing imprisonment for a man who has once been fined on the charge of violating the law would make it dangerous for a citizen who owns an automobile to use his machine after having faced the police judge, because, if perchance he should accidently misunderstand his chart and get arrested, it would mean a term in jail for an innocent and respected citizen and a blotch upon his character for having been behind the bars.

"Mr. SIMS's bill might be applicable in Linden, Tenn., where the squares are full grown, the streets less crowded, and automobiles scarcer, but it won't fit Washington or any city. It's ten years behind the times. There is only one case in the history of Washington where an automobile killed a man, and in this instance the chauffeur was exonerated. Washington has a population larger than the ten counties which Mr. SIMS represents. The city blocks are different from country blocks, and an automobile accident is different from that of a wagon. We are fighting to defeat the measure, and feel confident that it will not be given serious consideration."

The Automobile Club of Washington, at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, will meet the Commissioners in the District Building to discuss the various phases of the proposed legislation. The meeting was postponed from yesterday.

The Commissioners have been asked for their recommendation, and before passing on the measure they invited the automobile men of the city to express themselves. Mr. Caverly will make an argument before the Commissioners.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, that does not present a question of personal privilege. I think it is, on the whole, complimentary to the gentleman from Tennessee. It states what his bill is, and so forth, and I make the point that it presents no question of personal privilege.

Mr. SIMS. I think it is a matter of privilege, but of course must abide by the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. It occurs to the Chair, the point having been made, or without being made, that the gentleman from Tennessee can only proceed by way of unanimous consent in making a personal explanation.

Mr. PAYNE. How much time does the gentleman want? Ten or fifteen minutes?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; about ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have fifteen minutes to explain the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, the object of this article, of course, is intended to ridicule the bill, and try to kill it in this way. I think the bill is of importance. During the last Congress I was told by police officers that certain individuals had been arrested and fined as many as three times a day. As a matter of course, they were not arrested and fined for each offense that they committed. Rich, reckless, dare-devil young men, driving automobiles simply for pleasure, violated the police regulations of the District of Columbia with impunity and paid their fines as a matter of levity, and went wild in their reckless career. Upon investigation, I found that there was no law in the District of Columbia authorizing imprisonment for violation of this regulation, and I sought and had a conversation with the chief of police, and he showed me what the regulations were. He said there was no law on the subject.

The bill I introduced was drawn by an officer of the District of Columbia, and is with few exceptions the present police regulations; yet this Captain Caverly, whoever he is—I never saw him or read of him, but he seems to be president of the Automobile Club, and therefore is the representative of his club. Judging from the article only, I imagine he is a chauffeur who has recently been promoted from a push cart or a driver of a dray, as he seems to have about the conceptions we would expect from such a person. [Laughter and applause.] Being thus promoted, he has got what we call "the swell head."

He denounces this bill as being ten years behind, lacks ten years of being up-to-date, when, with slight changes, it is the present police regulations of the District of Columbia; yet he and his kind care so little for regulations that only impose fines as a punishment that he does not even know what the regulations are. Why, of course, such gentlemen as he is will not like imprisonment features of the bill. There is no doubt but that a great majority of the people who own automobiles in the District of Columbia do not violate the law or the regulations, but are careful to observe them. But there are just enough of these reckless characters at large on the streets to make it dangerous to travel the streets. Why, this "captain—chauffeur"—says that only one man has been killed in all the history of the District of Columbia by an automobile, and that the chauffeur was acquitted. I have not looked up to see how many men have been killed.

I suppose this captain—this president—perhaps cares nothing for the life of a child or a lady. How long has it been since all Washington was shocked by an accident which happened to a little child in the eastern part of Washington, near East Capitol street, that was run over and ruthlessly killed in the presence of those in charge of it by the reckless driving of an automobile? It is a matter of common occurrence and common observation that men driving even freight automobiles in the District of Columbia do not slow down at crossings, but blow their horns, which are a perfect nuisance, and persons afoot, whether children, women, or men, must take care of themselves. It is high time that we have a law in the District of Columbia. The good people do not need it, but the bad ones do, and need it badly, and I am heartily in favor of making imprisonment imperative after the first or second offense within a limited time. It is the only way to reach these reckless gentlemen who ride in automobiles simply as a matter of pleasure. It seems somehow or other that the driver of an automobile comes to the conclusion that he is a kind of superior being. The street cars must slow down in crossing streets, and we know where they cross. We know where their tracks are, but the automobiles run on all streets, and I have seen them dash across the streets at a speed not less than 20 miles an hour. I am very serious about this matter, and I hope the Members of the House will look into it. I do not know what the Commissioners are going to report, but I hope they will report favorably on this or some similar law. If they should report it unfavorably, I must admit that I should be surprised, but I do not think they will. You see what we have to meet in the way of ridicule. The person quoted in this article says this city has more population than my whole district. That is true, and I hope it always will have more population than my district if the population of my district is to be increased by the addition to it of such men as this article shows this man to be. We do not want such characters in the ten counties comprising the district in which I live. This man ridicules the streets of Linden. He was never in them, and for the sake of Linden I hope he never will be. [Laughter.]

But I care more to call the attention of this House to the necessity of this legislation than to anything said personally about myself. Considering the source from which that comes, I dismiss it, simply saying that the spirit manifested by this president of this automobile club is the best argument possible why such a law should be passed. He concludes that because there is a maximum speed limit the automobile man has got to run up to the maximum and then stop when he comes to a street, and that, he says, would be inconvenient. He admits that in the effort to do it he might kill half a dozen people. The bill does not require the drivers of automobiles to dash through the streets at the maximum speed, and I am perfectly willing to move to amend the bill to reduce the maximum when the bill is considered before the committee.

As I said before, I want to call the attention of the House to this measure, and I want the Members of the House to investigate it. It is needed and needed badly. Suppose they do not kill people, and suppose they do not wound them. The reason of it is largely because pedestrians—men, women, and children—run from these machines and take care of their lives by their own efforts. There is another thing—this nuisance of having a fog horn blown in your ears continually. Here comes an automobile on the right and it toots its horn. Here comes one on the left and it toots another one, and the poor pedestrian does not know which way to start, but he knows his life depends upon successful dodging. What is the necessity of having these things? You might just as well have carriages drawn by horses with fog horns to toot. Some of these people seem to have come to the conclusion that they are superior beings, and that the streets and avenues of Washington are for their exclusive benefit. The sooner these rich and reckless auto drivers are put behind prison bars the better it will be for the good people of this city, and no amount of ridicule will have the slightest effect in my efforts to pass this bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman? I understand the gentleman to be opposed to two features that are evident in the operation of automobiles in Washington. He is opposed to excessive speed and to excessive tooting.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; I am opposed to excessive speed and to excessive tooting. Excessive speed is dangerous and excessive tooting is a nuisance.

Now, it is evident that the leader of this House does not want me to occupy so much time. He has been very kind in asking unanimous consent. I would like to go into the provisions of the bill and explain it in detail, but under the circumstances I do not feel like asking for further time. [Applause.]

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 7, line 21, strike out the words "and Philippine" and change the word "six" to the word "two;" so that it will read: "For construction of seacoast batteries in the Hawaiian Islands, $200,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, it was brought out in the debate of yesterday that $400,000 of this appropriation was intended to be used in fortifying places in the Philippine Islands. It was also brought out that no definite plan had yet been made by the War Department for the expenditure of this money. That is to say, that the Department had not determined what places in the Philippine Islands should be fortified. It seems to me that that is a proper question to consider. It is also proper to consider how much money we are going to expend in the future for fortifications in the Philippine Islands. Now, if the United States should relinquish these islands, it is certain that we would then need only a coaling station and a naval base. It is pretty sure that if that time comes the place at which to maintain the coaling station and the naval base will be Subig Bay.

The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, in his statement to the House yesterday, made it clear to all those who were paying attention to his remarks that it would be practically useless to expend any more money of the Government in erecting fortifications at Cavite. He stated the naval bill would carry $65,000 for a pier to connect with the dry dock at Subig Bay. The dry dock, I believe, is on its way there now and will soon arrive. He stated also that this bill would carry $100,000 for machinery and appliances in order to make small and temporary repairs to vessels of the United States. Now, then, it seems we are developing a definite policy with respect to the place where the fortifications should be made, and the drift clearly seems to be in the direction of Subig Bay. If we do that, then at some future time when this Government desires to relinquish the Philippine Islands the money spent at Subig Bay will not be wasted. Every dollar that we spend there will be available to us for use as a coaling station and a naval base, but if we continue to expend money at Cavite other Governments in Europe will conclude, and properly, that that money will be spent for the protection of the capital city of Manila, and that will be regarded as conclusive evidence of the intention of the United States Government to hold the Philippine Islands permanently. There can be no question, after hearing the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs yesterday, based as it was upon the testimony of the highest experts in the Army and Navy Departments of this Government, that the best place for a coaling station and naval station is Subig Bay, and if we relinquish these islands all we will need is a coaling station and naval base. Therefore to go on appropriating money to be used at Cavite will be regarded as a declaration of the intention of holding the Philippine Islands permanently. We upon this side, Mr. Chairman, believe that we should give up the Philippine Islands at the very earliest opportunity. We believe that every fortification erected in the Philippine Islands is a barrier to the aspirations of the Filipinos for freedom. We believe that every dollar of American money invested in the Philippine Islands is but a link in the chain which will bind the Philippine Islands permanently to the United States. We upon this side think that there is no room under a republican form of government for the control of subject colonies. Therefore we ask that some definite policy with respect to the Philippine Islands be declared. It can be declared at no better time than now when we are appropriating money for the fortification of those islands.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Surely this Government ought not to continue any wasteful policy. No one, from the President down, has yet stated authoritatively that it is the intention of the Government to hold the Philippine Islands permanently, therefore we ought to declare some policy now and appropriate money in accordance with that policy. If we are to hold the Philippine Islands permanently, let us make our appropriations for fortifications upon that basis, but if we are to hold them only temporarily, let us then accommodate our appropriations to that system. In all events let us establish some clear rule and act intelligently upon that rule. Let us not appropriate money and at some future time find that because of a change in our policy much of the money appropriated has been wasted. Now, if the appropriation is confined to fortifications at Subig Bay, then whether we continue the present policy or whether we relinquish the islands not a single dollar of the money can be regarded by anybody as having been wastefully spent. Now, I believe that if any power should attempt to take the Philippine Islands, fortifications either at Subig Bay or Manila would not save those colonies to the United States. We would have to depend ultimately upon our fleets and not upon fortifications, so that it seems to me we ought not to spend a great deal of money in fortifications now. But there is one question that ought to be settled now, and that is whether we shall appropriate upon an economical basis or upon an extravagant basis. If we confine these appropriations to Subig Bay, then all agree we are not wasting our money. If we continue to appropriate for Cavite, then if we should give up the islands we certainly will have appropriated much of the public money to no useful purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is not to raise the question as to the advisability of an appropriation for Subig Bay. As I understand it, a gentleman from the minority proposes later to offer an amendment which will have for its object the striking out of any appropriation for Subig Bay. But this amendment, as proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN], is intended, as I take it, to emphasize a desire for the abandonment of the Philippine Islands, and to emphasize to the country that we desire to have work which has already been commenced, for which Congress has already appropriated a large sum of money, arrested now by the action of this House. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] says that nothing has been done in the direction of fortifications in the Philippine Islands. Unfortunately for him, that is not true, for there has been allotted out of money appropriated by this Congress for fortifications in the Philippine Islands, by the action of the War Department, $1,213,000, of which amount some $340,000 have already been expended.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF] yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. GRAFF. I do.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman is laboring under a misapprehension. I did not state that this Congress or any previous Congress had not appropriated money for fortifications.

Mr. GRAFF. I did not intend to charge the gentleman did state that, but I understood the gentleman to say that no action had been taken by the War Department in carrying out the work with the money which had already been appropriated.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. On the contrary, I stated that they have a station there now, and that they have a dry dock on its way there.

Mr. GRAFF. And they have now allotted $1,213,000 for coast batteries, outside of the money which has been appropriated through the medium of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Can the gentleman tell us where that $200,000 has been expended? At what points?

Mr. GRAFF. I am advised that it is $340,000.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Whatever it is.

Mr. GRAFF. It has been expended at Manila.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have no doubt of that. Has there been a dollar expended by the War Department at Subig Bay?

Mr. GRAFF. Just a small sum—a trifling sum.

Mr. GROSVENOR. To put up certain barracks there?

Mr. GRAFF. I mean for fortifications under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. A mere temporary structure.

Mr. GRAFF. Four hundred and fifty-five thousand dollars of this $1,213,000 of which I speak has been allotted for expenditures at Subig Bay, and $758,000 of that sum has been allotted for expenditure at Manila. When the estimates were made by the War Department at first, before they were sent in under the authority of the Secretary of War, the estimates for Honolulu and Pearl Harbor were $520,000, the estimate for Subig Bay was $500,000, and the estimate for Manila was $2,000,000. The Secretary of War reduced the estimate for Manila from $2,000,000 to $500,000, for Subig Bay from $500,000 to $240,000, and for Honolulu and Pearl Harbor from $520,000 to $260,000, making a total reduced estimate in gross for the work in the Hawaiian Islands and the Philippine Islands of $1,000,000.

This the committee reduced from $1,000,000 to $600,000, and they concluded that the same policy ought to be pursued by the committee with reference to appropriations with reference to the insular possessions that had been pursued during all of the periods that appropriations have been made for fortifications in continental United States, of not specifying any particular point at which fortifications were to be built, but leaving the War Department free to exercise their expert and scientific knowledge as to the particular places at which the expenditures would be made. And, furthermore, we were given to understand that it was wise for prudential reasons not to advise the world of the particular point where moneys were to be expended for fortification purposes and the particular amount to be spent at these various places.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF] have five minutes additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois have five minutes additional time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF] yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GRAFF. I do.

Mr. GROSVENOR. As I understand the gentleman, then, the idea is not to let the world know where these fortifications are to be built until they are actually finished and ready.

Mr. GRAFF. Not let them know how extensive they are at particular places.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Do you put them into some kind of a barrier like these public buildings?

Mr. GRAFF. How wise the policy may be, it was adopted when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] was a boy—only a short time ago—and it must have some wise reason for its establishment and recognition. And so the committee concluded to leave it in the discretion of those who possess scientific knowledge and experience to determine where this money is to be expended in our insular possessions, and they will be free to exercise their discretion and judgment with regard to the expenditure of this money. This proposed amendment is simply to abandon and arrest all further work upon this line in the Philippine Islands, and there is not a naval nor a military authority but that fully understands that continental America now needs protection from any threatened war which is likely to come by fortifications in our insular possessions rather than in continental United States.

Whether we abandon the Philippines or keep them can not now be determined; but certainly the nation upon this subject is a unit, that it is not the proper time for us to determine that fact. But it is no reason why we should not go ahead and provide for the future and for the present needs of the people who now inhabit that land. No matter under what flag they are governed, they will need some protection by fortifications along their coast. At the present time there is not a single gun that has been placed in the Philippine Islands, and this appropriation certainly has been as small as we could make it unless we desire to cut the appropriation off entirely and give the country to understand that we desire to abandon any movement in the direction of needed fortifications in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that there is a misapprehension upon the part of the gentleman from Ohio, and perhaps of others, about this motion. I understand that in a few moments a motion will be offered by the gentleman from New York providing that this money shall not be used at Subig Bay; but this is a proposition to provide that not one dollar shall be appropriated for any place in the Philippine Islands. Now, what is to become of the Philippine Islands? So far as I am personally concerned, if, after a lapse of years, they become fit for self-government, and then want it, I would be in favor of giving it to them. [Applause.] But I believe that, when under our tutelage and care these people shall have been lifted up until they are capable of discharging the duties of self-government, they will be as unwilling to be separated from the United States as any State of this Union now is. But whatever may be their future, I for one am too proud an American to be willing to leave the city of Manila open to attack, and in case of foreign complications, while we are in possession of the Philippines, whether temporarily or permanently, see some foreign fleet sail into Manila Bay and wrest the city of Manila from us, as did Dewey from Spain.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The gentleman and his colleague have both said that as yet no gun has been placed in the Philippine Islands. If some foreign government is going to seize the Philippine Islands, why have they not done it up to this time, when we have not put in a gun that would obstruct them?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. We have not been at war there, but work has been done already, and $340,000 has been expended at Manila so that this country shall not be made the victim, as was Spain, of the defenseless character of that harbor. I insist that whatever may be the opinion of the gentleman from Ohio or any other gentleman who went upon that trip last summer, that no man upon this floor ought to say that he is in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts that not a dollar more shall be spent in defense of Manila and to protect us from the dishonor that came to Spain.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, if a foreign fleet were, in a moment of forgetfulness of the real interest of the nation which it represented, to seize the Philippine Archipelago, I think it would be only a good joke on the government that owned the foreign navy, and it itself would find it out sooner or later.

I think this question of the fortification of the Philippine Islands presents a task immense, impossible, and useless. Gentlemen do not seem to realize that the coast around the various islands forming the Philippine Archipelago is greater in mileage than that of continental America—Gulf, Atlantic, and Pacific all put together. If you are going into that question, if you are going into the task of defending the Philippine Islands with an army and with fortifications, you will find that it is going to amount to $150,000,000 before you are through with it, and they will not be fortified then. The Philippine Islands can not be defended by the United States by land forts.

The possession of the Philippine Islands will depend upon the sea power of the governments that contend for its possession. The only good of having a fortification in a particular place in the Philippines would be to enable us to stand a siege at that particular place, whether successfully or unsuccessfully. Nothing indicates the folly of the whole Philippine proposition more than this. You put a burden upon the whole power of the nation of the United States by building up this responsibility away out from you and unprotected by your strongest arm, the Army of your soldiers on land, for that is where the United States, with its immense power and force of calling into action an immense volunteer army, is strongest in the last resort. You have made defenseless a position which must be defended by exposing to bombardment or other menace all the balance of the country. The archipelago has to be defended, if at all, by sea power, and in order to defend it by sea power the Gulf and the Atlantic and the Pacific in time of war must be left comparatively undefended. When war comes, if it comes with a power having a great navy, the United States Government will be forced to elect whether it shall defend itself or shall defend the Philippine Islands.

But, Mr. Chairman, if we could defend the Philippine Islands, if we could fortify them so that they would be absolutely impregnable, I would be opposed to it. We would lose the only chance we have, as I am afraid sometimes, of losing that blessed archipelago. I would rather lose it accidently, incidentally, or any other way than to run the chance of cutting off all opportunity of losing it at all. The gentleman predicts that the time may come when the Filipinos will be as anxious to stay with us as are the inhabitants of any State. Perhaps so, but it will not change my position, and I hope it will not change the position of others with regard to this question. I am partially opposed to retaining the Filipinos under our arbitrary government because of their interest and because of their wishes. I am very much more opposed to retaining them because of American interests and American future welfare. I am absolutely opposed to the proposition.

The gentleman says he does not know but the time may come when we will be willing to get rid of them. Ah, I welcome these Democratic tendencies in the hearts, and now and then upon the lips, of Republicans. Down in the bottom of your hearts you are, every one of you, sorry to-day that you did not follow the policy of the Democratic party and get rid of them early, when you more easily could. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We have already forced you to the place where your President, in his message, and your Secretary of War, in his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, have come to the Democratic position of divorcing ourselves from the islands, except that they have not fixed the date for carrying it out; that is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi moves to strike out the last word, and is recognized on that motion for five minutes.

Mr. SIBLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. SIBLEY. Do you think if it had not been for the great Democratic leader, we would ever have had those islands in the first place?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, that is one of those awkward questions which a fellow hates to answer. I am a little bit inclined to believe that the gentleman referred to—for whom I have so much regard and respect, who served with me in this House, and between whom and myself a relationship of almost brotherly affection existed in the Fifty-third Congress—made the great mistake of his life when he did not let you people fail to do what you so unpatriotically were united in trying to do, to wit, ratify the Spanish treaty. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi if at the same time did not the gentleman to whom Mr. SIBLEY refers—Mr. Bryan—advocate the giving of independence to the Philippine Islands?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes.

Mr. JAMES. And at that time, when the treaty was under consideration, the purpose of his advocacy of the treaty was to stop the war and at the same time give independence to the people in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Undoubtedly. I do not care about discussing that, but practically at that time the war was at an end and Spain was so helpless that she could never have proceeded with any active hostile operations; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] can not, by asking me that question, shirk the responsibility of the Republican party for what was done. But for the votes which were furnished by the Republican party, the two or three Democratic Senators who voted with the Republican party could not have confirmed that treaty, and the gentleman can not escape from the party responsibility for the position in which the country now finds itself. He can very well, of course, in an ad captandem way, say that there was contributory negligence on the part of two or three Democrats, and he can single out one of them, very distinguished in our ranks, as the one, in his opinion, chiefly responsible for the contributory negligence. But the real negligence which led to this accident, which has been so crippling in its influence since, was a Republican negligence. You were off guard that year; you did not have your eyes upon old Democratic and old American—for that is broader and more patriotic—principles. You forgot what your forefathers fought for when the Republic emerged from the throes of the war of independence. In your greed for prestige and conquest and wealth, you made up your minds that you would go a-world-powering, holding crown colonies, and one of your Senators described how you would get rich at it, the streams of Pactolus all flowing with gold; and the impudent question was put to the American people, "Does it pay?" And following upon the question came the great Senatorial Republican pronunciamento, "If it does pay, we will do it; if it does not pay, we will not do it." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is it not a fact that when Mr. Bryan agreed to this ratification, President McKinley was proclaiming all over the country that forcible annexation was criminal aggression, and that the position of the Republican party was against the annexation and holding of these islands?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The President had been saying that, but he had quit saying that a little while before then.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; he went out West on the tail end of a Pullman car——

Mr. WILLIAMS. He had already found out that forcible annexation was not criminal aggression. He is dead. I would prefer not to discuss his conduct.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. He went out West and returned an expansionist.

Mr. HAMILTON. Is it not true that we would not have had the Philippine Islands if it had not been for the fact that at the time of the ratification of the treaty of peace the Senate of the United States was controlled, as to the two-thirds vote on ratification, by Democrats, Populists, and free-silver Republicans?

Mr. CLARK. It was not so controlled.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; the Senate was strongly Republican—nearly two-thirds. If the gentleman from Michigan was put in a crowd of eight men who had committed a robbery, he might perhaps excuse himself as one of the seven, all of whom were Republicans, let us say, by saying that the eighth man who joined in it was a Democrat, and call robbery a Democratic doctrine, but few people of common sense would take any stock in it.

Mr. HAMILTON. Could the treaty of peace been ratified otherwise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; nor without a virtually solid Republican vote. What delights me now is to discover from the very character of these interrogatories, that the Republican side of this Chamber is apologizing for the position it took [laughter and applause on the Democratic side] and has not even now the courage frankly to forsake.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended two or five minutes, in order that I may ask him a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Make it ten minutes and then I can yield some of my time to the constant interruptions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Now, will the gentleman from Mississippi permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Much as the gentleman desires to separate the Philippine Islands from this country, do I understand him seriously to declare that his pride in this country would reconcile him to see the Philippine Islands forcibly taken away from us by some other country?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, as an American citizen I would of course feel humiliated—shamed—if an American fleet upon any water or an American army upon any land were defeated by men who were attacking them under any other flag that floats over the surface of this earth. But I would feel, if in consequence of defeat of that sort we had gotten rid of the Philippine Islands, that there was some compensatory advantage even in defeat and humiliation. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

I would rather whip the enemy even when I was wrong than to have the enemy whip me, of course; but I would rather be whipped when I was wrong than to be whipped when I was right any day. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Does the gentleman claim that any other country has any right to take the Philippines away from us?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do know that they have not. I am certain that they have not any higher right to take the islands than we had, and I am certain that we had none. [Laughter.] They stand precisely in our shoes. No American can say that we had any right to take the Philippine Islands unless some American can say that George the Third and Parliament had a higher right to keep the American colonies; they both stand on the same footing—conquest, greed, arrogant assumption of superior right to govern others despite their objection.

Even if the people of the Philippine Islands became willing it would not change my opinion, because I object to holding them chiefly on account of the American people, American institutions, and because in addition it means the annexation of a gigantic and insoluble race problem, which you will find coming back to plague you like a poisoned chalice as the years roll on.

But I want chiefly to congratulate the Republican party, its President, its Secretary of War, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON], who interrupted me a moment ago, upon having reached the first state of repentance—not a broken, but, at any rate, a contrite heart; and having assumed an apologetic attitude toward what they have done and upon now seeking to throw off the blame of the entire matter upon an unsuccessful candidate for the Presidency upon the Democratic ticket. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

I assume that when you blame him with having led to the confirmation of the treaty, that you mean by blaming him to blame him for having done something that was wrong. If it were something that was right, of course gentlemen would not have been interrupting me to lay the blame at his door.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman from Mississippi always amazes and entertains us with his erudition. I am satisfied that he can give me an explicit and clear answer to a question that I am about to ask him. Does history anywhere offer us an instance where a race as alien as the Philippines are to the Americans has become reconciled to political association?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It not only offers no instance, but offers us abundant instances to the contrary. The nearest that any people, equally unassimilable to their conquerors as the Filipinos are to us, ever came to being reconciled to the Government which held control of them is perhaps to be found in British India. Yet there is not a British civil or military officer who does not know that at the first opportunity, the bands that have held them being removed, the entire Hindu people would spring forward to the assertion of some sort of self-government, even if it were under the lead of a Hindu dictator, and so would the people of the Philippine Islands. Gentlemen, there is an absolute unassimilability between any two races the members of one of which, out of self-respect and to prevent social ostracism and contempt by other members of it, will not intermarry with the other. People frequently speak of the old question, "Would you let your daughter marry a man of this race?" as being impertinent and irrelevant. It is and was pertinent and relevant, because it springs and sprang from the instinct of the people. There can not be perfect equality without perfect fraternity. There can not be perfect fraternity without the possibility, at any rate, of legal blood relationship. Without that there can never be genuine homogeneity or reconciliation.

Now, to leave the greater question, I do not want to spend a dollar to fortify the Philippine Islands for another reason, to wit, that I want every dollar that the American people have to spend at all expended in home development—in the States for education and good roads—and by the National Government for deep rivers and harbors, which forever hold a veto power upon the exploitation of the people by high railroad freight rates. [Applause.] Here we stand still to-day, while France, Prussia, Austria, all of them, are going on building canals, deepening harbors, cleaning out rivers, when the great American nation, the wealthiest upon the face of the globe, can not, by its own admission, pass an annual river and harbor bill, but says that at best two years must intervene; can not pass bills to erect United States public buildings to save undue expenditures for rent. There is the great peninsula of Florida that ought to be cut by a canal, doing away with all the expense in money and time of going around it from the Atlantic to enter the Gulf. Here is the great coal-bearing country of Alabama and Tennessee with nothing necessary to enable its coal to float down to New Orleans, and so to the Gulf, except a little bit of a short canal between the Tennessee and the Mississippi rivers, going into the Mississippi just above Memphis. There is the dangerous coast of Cape Hatteras, and all that is necessary to avoid it is an inland canal behind the islets and within the sounds. Yet we are met every year with the proposition that "we can not do it." "we have not the money," "it will cause a deficit," and why? Because you put yourselves where you are supporting 40,000 soldiers a year more than you would need without the Philippine Islands; you put yourselves where, as the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs knows, that you will need forty-eight more war vessels with the Philippine Islands than you would need without them, and I think he will not rise in his place and deny that proposition.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. FOSS. Whether we keep the Philippines or not, is not the gentleman in favor of a naval base there?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, I am, and I will come to that now. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the United States Government having coaling stations everywhere where it is well for its commerce and well for itself to have them. Fix now the places to be held permanently for that purpose, even if we release the Philippines, and I will vote to fortify those special places. There is in the Philippine Archipelago a little island named Batan, and down at Batan there is an immensely deep harbor, landlocked and protected. Right around there is the only place where there is coal. I would suggest it as a place to keep as a coaling station and to fortify to keep. I said I was glad a moment ago that the President and the Secretary of War and these gentlemen had come to the Democratic position, except that they had not yet fixed a date. What is the position that they agree with us about? It is that in the long run we ought to treat the Philippine Islands like we treated Cuba. We retained coaling stations there and we ought to have coaling stations at convenient places if we never had a war, as far as that is concerned. I want as few points of contact with foreign nations as possible for fear of war. Batan has only 5 by 10 miles. It has very little population. It brings no contact. I would fortify Batan. It has coal and a good harbor. It is on the way from San Francisco to Manila, and it is the most useful place for that purpose, whether in war or peace.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I shall not object to that, but I do hope that the gentleman will try to conclude in the five minutes, as they have had so much more time than we have had.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will do me the justice to confess that I did try to conclude, but that interruptions prevented. Mr. Chairman, there is much more that I would like to say, and might say, but I realize the fact that no one ought at this time to monopolize the floor any great length of time and I shall yield it. [Applause.]

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] speaks of the policy of the Republican party in connection with the Philippines, and that we are receding from that policy. In my judgment, as a matter of history, the acquisition of the Philippine Islands was never the policy of anybody distinctly as such.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit an interruption?

Mr. SIBLEY. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask if a great President of this country, the leader of the Republican party, when faced with this Philippine proposition, did not ask the question, and whether the Republican party did not immediately applaud the question, "Who shall haul down the flag?" and whether that did not mean the permanent retention of the Philippine Islands?

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, that question he did ask and it could be reiterated to-day, and the answer is up to you just as much now as it was then—who will haul it down? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will answer it. The American people, whose sailors and soldiers—their servants—put it there. [Applause.]

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I often hear my friend speak of the partnership existing between God and the Republican party, and we do not deny that we are attempting to act along the lines of Providence as far as we may be able to interpret them.

As the result of a war waged for humanity, because the cries of the downtrodden had reached the throne of the Almighty, this nation bared its arm and drew its sword in relief of the oppressed, and as one of the consequences of that war there came to us, not from the deliberation of a President, of a Cabinet council, of any general, or naval hero, or officialdom anywhere, our position in the Philippine Archipelago. When the treaty of Paris, negotiated as it was by the most eminent of men, came back to the United States Senate for ratification, it was then our place to ratify or refuse to ratify it and again open negotiations upon the basis of leaving the Philippines to Spain. From that distinguished gentleman to whom I have referred, and for whom I entertain the warmest personal affection, I received a letter, as you probably did, urging use of whatever influence I might possess in the Senate to the end that the treaty might be ratified. I did not personally believe it to be wise, because I believed then what I believe now, that the moment that the ratification occurred, then the responsibility was on our shoulders, not as Republicans or Democrats alone, but the citizens of the United States under one flag, to maintain order and protect life and property there.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. SIBLEY. In a moment. The responsibility came to us, not as a Republican measure, not as a Democratic measure, but we have the responsibility, and the question is, How shall we exercise it? My judgment is we are fulfilling, in some way inscrutable to men, the designs of Almighty Providence, which rules among all nations of this world.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon the section and amendment be closed in five minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I hope that motion will not be adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to press this motion if any desire to be heard. I did hope that the committee would be satisfied to close in five minutes, but I will withhold the motion for a while.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be granted five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may have five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIBLEY. I think I will not occupy that time and yield to a question from the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he understands that in any moment of his existence Mr. Bryan, to whom he referred a moment ago, ever advocated the permanent holding of the Philippine Islands by the United States or had it in mind that the United States would do that?

Mr. SIBLEY. I can not speak with full authority on that subject.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. You were in the House then and——

Mr. SIBLEY. Congress is responsible for that acquisition and should be held responsible, but the distinguished Senator of your State, who has so illumined the pages of our American history, the Hon. George Vest, said to me in the presence of others in the cloakroom of the Senate a year later that William Jennings Bryan had attempted to teach him his duty, who for twenty-five years had tried to understand and master the problems of statecraft, and except for his action we would never have had the archipelago and all the burdens it entails.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I did not ask about Mr. Vest. I asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who was at that time one of the household of Mr. Bryan, if he does not know as a matter of fact that Mr. Bryan at every moment of his public existence has been opposed to the United States holding the Philippine Islands, and if it is not due, as a matter of fairness from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to now state that which he then confidentially knew, that Mr. Bryan was then opposed to this policy as he is now.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, that was not confidential. That was a matter of public action. No man can plead confidence when the question involved was whether or not this nation should hold sovereignty over 7,000,000 people.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Both of you at that time were liberal Democrats upon the great free-silver question, both of you were confidential in a common fight, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania was so close to Mr. Bryan at that time that he does know, as a matter of fact, Mr. Bryan was opposed to the acquisition of the Philippine Islands to hold them as a possession.

Mr. SIBLEY. The free-silver question had been as dead as Julius Cæsar long before this time. The only trouble was that you did not recognize it until 1904. You found it out afterwards.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was then a partner with Mr. Bryan in his political views. He knew what the views of Mr. Bryan were, and it is no less than fairness, if he knows, to state that Mr. Bryan then opposed the permanent retention of any people against their consent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SIBLEY. If the gentleman was as familiar with my history as he is with the history of his leader, he would never have said that, because Mr. Bryan had it straight from me, and I stated it on the floor of this House, that I could not follow his party in its policies, that I would never stand within the lines of a party and fight it, but would go, where my friends suggested, on the other side of the House and oppose it face to face. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. SIBLEY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am only going to have five minutes, and desire to say something more on the——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We will extend your time.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to ask the gentleman this question with reference to this matter of the confirmation of the treaty: Did not the United States Senate, either the next day or a few days after the ratification of the treaty of Paris, pass what was known as the "McEnery resolution," in which it was declared that it was not the intention of the United States to permanently hold the Philippines?

Mr. SIBLEY. I think, Mr. Chairman, that is the policy that the Republican party declares to-day; but we are going to hold the Philippine Islands until we have lifted them up on a higher plane of civilization than that on which we found them; and we have done that, too. There is less cruelty, less rapacity, now in the Philippines in a year than there was in any twenty-four hours prior to our occupancy. [Applause on the Republican side.] Good government has taken the place of anarchy, law has taken the place of robbery, violence, and murder, and a man can ride in safety through the major portion of those possessions to-day. And the spelling book and the schoolhouse, the Bible and the church, with courts of justice, and all that goes to lift men on to a higher plane of civilization we have given them, and we are going to carry this burden as long as it is our plain duty. And when it shall appear that the higher duty of this nation is to surrender——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be given ten minutes of additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be given ten minutes of additional time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JAMES rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. SIBLEY. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman this question. The gentleman does not wish to make any statement here that would be manifestly unfair to a man who was his friend, to say the least of it. The gentleman says that Mr. Bryan wrote a letter asking for his opinion on the ratification of this treaty. Did he give any reason why he wanted that treaty ratified?

Mr. SIBLEY. I think the first I heard from him was in the nature of a telegram.

Mr. JAMES. Is it not true that Mr. Bryan advocated the ratification of that treaty for the purpose of giving the Filipinos their freedom?

Mr. SIBLEY. If the gentleman from Kentucky says he knows that, I will accept it as a matter of fact.

Mr. JAMES. I am asking the gentleman as a witness whether or not it was true. You were here with him.

Mr. SIBLEY. No; I was not here with him.

Mr. JAMES. And was it not the policy of the Republican party at that time, and the policy of the Republicans in the Senate at that time, when they were attempting to get this treaty ratified, to proclaim the ultimate freedom of these islands and give the people of the Philippine Islands their liberty, as we have Cuba?

Mr. SIBLEY. I do not understand that so much in the nature of a question as I do in the nature of a statement. I do not understand that the gentleman has asked a direct question, but that he has made a statement. I presumed that there was a question that was going to be asked.

Mr. JAMES. What does the gentleman say his knowledge was as to that?

Mr. SIBLEY. I had no knowledge on that.

Mr. JAMES. And yet the gentleman states that he came to the city here in response to that telegram?

Mr. SIBLEY. No; I did not come, because I did not agree with that policy. I was not one of those who desired the ratification of that treaty.

Mr. JAMES. I understand. But will the gentleman deny that it was the policy of Mr. Bryan at that time and his purpose to give freedom to these people?

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I can not say what was in his mind any more than I can say what was in the mind of my distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] at any moment in his career. If he says that was Mr. Bryan's intention I accept his statement and will make no denial of its correctness.

Mr. JAMES. Would not the gentleman explain——

Mr. SIBLEY. But you claim the Republican party are responsible for our occupancy of the Philippines. I simply embraced Mr. Bryan and the great Democratic party of this nation as also responsible for our occupancy.

Mr. JAMES. I believe that you said that the Republican party and God are in partnership there; that would be joining light with darkness, corruption with incorruption. [Applause.]

Mr. SIBLEY. Whenever you talk about the Republican party and God, and it comes in a slurring way from that side often, if the Republican party has been attempting to act in accordance with the will of God the Democratic party had better reverse its policy and its way instead of standing against the Lord Almighty and all the facts of history and survey the marvelous victories that have been accomplished by the Republican party following such leadership [loud applause]—the great good it has accomplished in the elevation of moral sentiment and the higher ideals of national life and national honor. Gentlemen talking about God and the Republican party must not endeavor to get away from the meaning of what they say.

Mr. JAMES. Then you were away from God when you were with the Democratic party?

Mr. SIBLEY. Now, my friend, do you want me to enter a plea of guilty? [Great laughter.]

Mr. JAMES. Oh, no.

Mr. SIBLEY. If I enter a plea of guilty, will that suffice?

Mr. JAMES. I want to know whether, during the time you were serving the Democratic party, God was on that side, or whether you discovered God when you found the Republican party? [Laughter.]

Mr. SIBLEY. Oh, my friend, I was a Republican all my life. The first Democratic vote I ever cast was for Grover Cleveland, in 1892. Let me tell you a little history, since you have brought that up. I have read a thousand times that I was a Republican, then a Greenbacker, and then a Democrat, and then a Populist [laughter], and then a Democrat, and then a Prohibitionist, and then a Republican. I have never considered a denial necessary; but since you mention it I will state the facts. I never voted for a Democrat for President except Grover Cleveland, in 1892, and William Jennings Bryan, in 1896. Now, then, if anything in the world ever justified anybody in charging me with being a Populist, it was my vote for Bryan in 1896 [laughter and applause], and nothing else. I never was a Prohibitionist. [Laughter.] As I look about those who know me well, it seems no denial of that statement will be necessary. [Great laughter.] I did stump the State of Pennsylvania in favor of the constitutional amendment for local option.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What about your being a Greenbacker?

Mr. SIBLEY. I stumped my section of Pennsylvania and a portion of New York against what was known as the "greenback heresy," and voted against the Greenback candidates and for the candidates of the Republican party. And therefore I have been a member of just two parties, unless you make me a Populist because of my vote for Mr. Bryan in 1896.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, I understand my good friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania to argue that this Philippine affliction is a providential affliction sent upon us by the Lord Almighty.

Mr. SIBLEY. Oh, unquestionably; yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And I know that he must mean that in some scientific way, because there is not a particle of the hypocrite about the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and never was.

Mr. SIBLEY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He must mean it somewhat in the same sense that when one man kills another it is the act of God, because if God had wanted to prevent it He could have done it. That is about what the gentleman means, isn't it? [Laughter.] Now, I should like to ask the gentleman one more question in that connection: As one of the most observant men I have ever known, and a careful reader, have not the gentleman's reading and his observation both taught him that whenever a fellow gets a little bit ashamed of something that he has been engaged in he always lays it upon the Lord?

Mr. SIBLEY. Oh, no; I will tell you the way we do over here. We go to Him and kneel down, plead guilty, and seek forgiveness. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, was this not the purpose of Mr. Bryan, expressed time and again? We want to get it straight. We do not want to do anybody any injustice. Mr.

Bryan said it was easier for us to acquire the Philippine Islands and ourselves turn the Philippine Islands loose and give them their independence than to refuse to acquire the Philippine Islands and turn them back to Spain, which country had refused for years and centuries to give them their independence. In other words, as President McKinley has said, he was against forcible annexation, but Mr. Bryan thought it was easier and better for us to take charge of those people who had been our allies and turn them loose than to turn them back to their enemies, who had refused to turn them loose. Are not these the facts and was not that his position?

Mr. SIBLEY. I would not assert to the contrary, but I should like to ask any gentleman here who has been a student below the surface of the Philippine situation if he does not believe that had we surrendered to the Filipino himself possession of those islands, with his lack of knowledge of self-government, the consequences would have been disastrous to the Filipino? You gentlemen on that side have had some very striking examples, in your portion of this Federal domain, of power coming suddenly to those unqualified by education and enlightenment for the discharge of the duties of good citizenship, and you know better than any other men, or ought to know, that there would have been anarchy and continuous bloodshed and revolution in the Philippines a thousandfold worse than in Santo Domingo. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does my friend deny that what I have stated was the position of Mr. Bryan?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to get through with my question. Have I not correctly stated Mr. Bryan's position? Do you deny that that was his position?

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have not the ability to answer whether the gentleman has stated it correctly or not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is the poorest answer you ever gave to any question.

Mr. SIBLEY. I have no doubt the gentleman has endeavored to state it correctly, as he apprehended it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That was Mr. Bryan's position; I have talked with him and he has so stated to me, and that was his position, publicly stated.

Mr. SIBLEY. When the gentleman says that, I accept his statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may have two minutes in which to answer a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. SIBLEY] may have two minutes additional.

Mr. SULZER. I ask unanimous consent that he may have ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for a question?

Mr. SIBLEY. I do.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I understand my friend to say that in 1896 he formed a combination of Democracy and Populism. Is that right?

Mr. SIBLEY. Oh, no. I said that if there was any justice in the charge that I had ever been a Populist it could be based alone upon the fact that in 1896 I did vote for Mr. Bryan.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, let me ask the gentleman this question: Do I understand that his former associates, known as Democrats, have laid the charge of desertion against him? Is that true?

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, that may be true, but in self-justification I do not know that I would be doing wrong to repeat a private conversation.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I desire to assure my friend that if that charge of desertion now stands against him I want, showing an act of friendship on my part, to introduce a bill for his relief. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIBLEY. I presume it would not be transcending the bounds of propriety if I should refer to a conversation I had with two distinguished friends on the other side of the Chamber. During the Presidential conventions—before the last election—I was on the other side of the water, and I read with great interest the speeches of the permanent chairman and the temporary chairman of the Democratic convention; and then I read the speeches of notification, and there was one of those notification speeches which alarmed me, as a Republican, because it was pitched on such a high plane. That was the notification made by the gentleman from Missouri. The Democratic party could not stay up on that high plane during the entire campaign, and they met with disaster. I met my friends after I came back from abroad, and I told them that I had read their speeches, and that I remembered very well standing over there in yonder portion of this very Chamber and giving expression to the fact that it was the duty of the Democratic party to drop the free-silver issue, because we were blind if we could not recognize the fact that it was dead—very dead, indeed—that the American people had placed their verdict upon it and that the increased production of gold amounted to much more than the combined production of both metals in any previous year in the history of the world, and promised sufficient basic money to arrest the continuous decline in prices; and that, responsive to that increased basic wealth, the prices of commodities not only in this nation alone, but the prices of all human products would rise throughout the world, as would be indicated by the system of "index numbers." And because I entertained that opinion, and because I believed that, having assumed responsibility in the Philippine Islands, William McKinley was right in asking the question, "Who would haul down the flag?" one of my frends suggested that if I entertained such views my place was over on this side of the Chamber instead of on that, and I promptly responded that if it was necessary for one to have a seat upon the Republican side of this Chamber in order to act in accordance with his patriotic convictions of duty he could consider my place over here from that moment. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Mr. Chairman, I had to wait to read these speeches of the distinguished presiding officers of the Democratic national convention, six years, for them to indorse and ratify those very views for which they banished me from their side over here on to this side of the Chamber. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

One of these gentlemen—if I may repeat a private conversation—I won't indicate which one—one of them said: "Why, SIBLEY, we knew six years ago free silver was dead just as well as you did, but it was such a lovely corpse that we wanted to keep it with us as long as we could." [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of trespassing for a minute on the time of this House, but when I heard my friend from Mississippi it occurred to me it was not just to charge as a matter of Republican policy that the accession of the Philippines was caused by lust of empire or to exploit a great people, but, to state my opinion briefly, that as the result of a just war we found ourselves there charged with the responsibility of the maintenance of law and order and person and property.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania this question in connection with this much-mooted question of "God putting us there."

Mr. SIBLEY. Oh, the gentleman from Mississippi is a much better authority on theology than myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask this question: Suppose at the treaty of Paris we had merely not mentioned the Philippines at all, would they have gone back to the dominion of Spain? Wasn't it true at that very time that the Filipinos had reconquered everything in the islands except Iloilo and Manila, and that they had captured the whole Spanish army except about 5,000 troops? And in connection with that I want to ask a further question, because some gentlemen on this side, even, seem to have a wrong impression, viz, that the islands would have gone back to Spain.

Is it not true that the Filipinos had already virtually reconquered and obtained their liberty and independence, and all we had to do to render assurance doubly sure was to send our prisoners back to Spain from the Philippines, as we did from Cuba, in American vessels? Is not that true, and is not this true, I will ask the gentleman as a philosophic student of history, that while every people in the world can not carry on good government, every people in the world are entitled to carry on their government? They might have had an Aguinaldo for a dictator, just as Mexico has a Diaz; and they would have been far better off to-day if they had.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, all human history negates the proposition that every people in the world are entitled to carry on their government. It is the putting bad government behind us for the higher and truer and better government that has taken man from barbarism to the heights of civilization. [Applause.] That is my conclusion from reading human history.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. SIBLEY. Well, I have hardly commenced to answer the other question, but I yield.

Mr. BURGESS. While the gentleman from Pennsylvania is on the stand, I would like to ask him a question. He assumes that the Republican policy in the Philippines is that of permanent retention of the islands.

Mr. SIBLEY. Do I assume that?

Mr. BURGESS. Does the gentleman not so assume?

Mr. SIBLEY. I do not; no, sir.

Mr. BURGESS. Well, I misunderstood the gentleman. I understood the gentleman to assert a while ago that the leader of the Republican party had said by that triumphant question, "Who shall pull down the flag?" that it was the policy of the party never to take it down.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am glad the gentleman has asked me the question, because I would not wish to have been misunderstood in that way.

Mr. BURGESS. Well, if the gentleman does not understand that to be the Republican policy, will he please state what he does understand to be the Republican policy?

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would not flatter myself, after looking around this body at these distinguished colleagues of mine, into thinking or assuming that I was the proper person to expound the policy of the party. I will merely state my individual opinion, that we will stay there until good government and law and order——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, we will stay there until education and enlightenment and a higher conception of the duties and responsibilities of self-government may come to these people. we will not make the mistake that we did after the civil war of giving 4,000,000 people the elective franchise, unqualified in any manner by education as they were to discharge the duties of the electorate. [Applause.]

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I welcome that admission of the gentleman that for one time the Republican party deserted God, and I agree with that contention. The gentleman, I understand, has changed his party relations not on account of men but on account of issues, because his judgment approved those things for which Cleveland and Bryan stood at the time he supported them and at other times he voted the Republican ticket for the same reason. Now, then, upon the Philippine question, I ask the gentleman in all candor, taking both their platforms since this question arose, can he determine from them what his relation ought to be with reference to this question? In other words, has the Republican party, as a party in convention assembled, in either of the national conventions following the ratification of the treaty of Paris, taken any position with reference to the permanent retention of the Philippine Islands?

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think the answer to that is that there has never been, from any authoritative source, any declaration that it is the policy of the Republican party to permanently retain possession of the Philippine Islands. I have never heard that doctrine asserted.

Mr. BURGESS. Just one other question: Is it not true, on the other hand, that the present President of the United States, the present Secretary of War, and the present Secretary of State have practically agreed in public addresses that ultimate independence for the Filipino is the goal of their stride?

Mr. SIBLEY. Yes; that is the Republican position.

Mr. BURGESS. How does the gentleman know?

Mr. SIBLEY. Because that is the declaration of the very men the gentleman has named, the present President of the United States, the present Secretary of War, and the present Secretary of State, and the statement of all leaders whose opinion carries conviction that ripens into action at the proper season, and I believe the gentleman will not deny the fairness of the proposition that to give people self-government who by long years of oppression, ignorance, superstition, and cruelty are unfitted for the discharge of those duties would be a wrong, not alone to them but to ourselves. It would be a betrayal of trust. This nation stands as the trustees of the Lord Almighty for their own welfare, and for all the nations of the earth, if you please. You may be consumed with doubts, but none the less we are acting for these people in the capacity of a trustee or guardian. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BURGESS. I agree entirely with the gentleman that it would be folly to adopt the "scuttle" policy in reference to these people. I agree entirely that the ultimate independence for them ought to be worked out by some practical method——

Mr. SIBLEY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BURGESS. Just in a moment, when I finish. Which will result in safety to life, liberty, and property and in honor and dignity to the United States, but does not the gentleman recognize that the power and the only constitutional power, as was said by perhaps one of the greatest constitutional lawyers in this Congress at the other end of the Capitol at the special session of the Senate last, is vested in Congress to declare what the ultimate status of the Philippine Islands will be?

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I never recognized the truth of the old saying of how much easier it is to ask questions than it is to answer them as I do this morning. I want to say that every drop of blood in me is Yankee blood; I never had an outcross even back to the Puritans.

Mr. BURGESS. I am not complaining of it.

Mr. SIBLEY. Therefore I am going to avail myself of the inherited Yankee privilege to ask you a question.

Mr. BURGESS. Certainly.

Mr. SIBLEY. And I want you to be as frank as I have tried to be in this discussion.

Mr. BURGESS. I will do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to inflict myself upon this debate until I heard the question put by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the gentleman from Mississippi. That question not having received as complete an answer as I think it should have received, I desire to call attention to the omission. I believe that this country knows—certainly those who read the newspapers know—that before the ratification of the Paris treaty, during the pendency of the Paris treaty, and in every public utterance since the ratification of the Paris treaty Mr. Bryan has stated, upon the stump and through the columns of the press, that he was opposed to the governing of any people except by their consent. He has uttered that in season and out of season, and there is not a man in this Chamber but who knows, and knows with definiteness and certainty, that Mr. Bryan was opposed to the retention of the Philippine Islands. He had what I believe was a mistaken view in thinking the best way to free them was to ratify the treaty and then give them their independence. He conceded to the Republicans a fairness which time has proven they did not possess. He believed that the Republican Senate and the Republican House would give to the Filipinos their independence. Having that confidence in the manhood, patriotism, and fairness of the Republicans, he was willing to ratify that treaty and put it in the hands of the Republicans in the House and in the Senate to do that which before God he always maintained was just. I am not capable of making this explanation as fully as it ought to be made, and I wish that the gentleman from Mississippi, when the interrogation was put to him, had taken time enough in his clear and lucid style to have properly stated the position of Mr. Bryan at that time, before that time, and forever since; but it was not done, and I felt called upon, as one of the Democratic Members of this House, to say for Mr. Bryan what he is not here to say for himself; that he never for a moment entertained the idea that the ratification of the Paris treaty would result in the permanent retention of the Philippine Islands or to submit them for one year to a domination to which they did not consent. I felt that this ought to be said by somebody, and as nobody else has said it, I have taken occasion to do it myself. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this amendment be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that debate upon the pending amendment be closed in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I will ask the gentleman from Iowa if I am not entitled to five minutes to close the debate?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed in ten minutes on this amendment—five minutes to be given to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL] and five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, the question before the committee is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN]. It is claimed by him, as I understand it, that the effect of this appropriation of $400,000 for seacoast batteries on the Philippine Islands may, and perhaps will, result in the selection of Subig Bay as a permanent place for a naval station. Now, if that be the effect of this appropriation, I shall vote for it and against the amendment, the more readily, because I fully believe in the wisdom of the selection of Subig Bay as against Cavite, the other place or location proposed. The great engineers of the Army and Navy have been there and examined these two sites. The majority, if not all of them, first agreed on Olongapo on Subig Bay as the best and most available location for a permanent naval and coaling station. Since that time some of the Navy and Army officers and engineers have modified their opinions, and are inclined toward the selection of Cavite for such station. Arguments, and perhaps good arguments, may be given for each conclusion. I am not an engineer, and make no pretensions as to my judgment in such matters. I spent a day at Cavite, and had the same opportunity of examining Subig Bay as the other members of the Taft party, save two gentlemen who made a special trip to Olongapo. Subig Bay is a large, beautiful body of deep water, landlocked, except a narrow passage broad enough and deep enough for the largest ships, and narrow enough to be easily defended by fortifications on either side.

The weight of expert authority is clearly, in my judgment, in favor of the location at Subig Bay, and since the experts disagree as between the two sites proposed—Olongapo and Cavite—and it comes to Congress for determination, each Member must exercise his own judgment, basing it on such grounds and circumstances as he may think sufficient. But aside from the expert testimony and recommendations as to the selection of a permanent site for a naval and coaling station, there is another reason, Mr. Chairman, which persuades me toward the selection of Subig Bay. We are now in the occupation of the Philippine Archipelago and have been since 1898. There is no general consensus of opinion as to how long we will continue there. Those islands came into our possession as a result of the war with Spain. Some call it an accident. Some speak of it as providential. Some criticise the action of our Government in appropriating them. Others maintain to this day that the treaty of Paris and the acquisition of the Philippines was an act of great wisdom and wise statesmanship. Many well-informed people in both of the great political parties favored that treaty at that time, and many patriotic citizens of both parties never believed in it. But at the present time no great good can be achieved by looking backward. If it were a mistake, there is no use in crying over spilt milk. It is for us now to look forward. Our Government is certainly not trying to enrich itself at the expense of the Filipino people. It is not striving to injure them or exploit them or their resources in the interest of this Government, or in the interest of our people. Our Government and the insular government of the Philippine Islands are striving earnestly to educate those little brown people, to improve them, to raise them up intellectually, industrially, socially, and politically, in order that in the course of time they may be fit to govern themselves.

From a short glimpse into those islands and a little opportunity for observation as to their appearance, character, environment, and tendencies, they are not, in my judgment, fit for self-government; certainly not fit according to our notion of fitness, and it would be very surprising if they were. It is practically impossible for the great mass of any people to develop those characteristics of head and heart which will qualify them for self-government in the form of a democracy or republic where they are under the absolute domination of another—a superior and stronger power. Secretary Taft is big hearted as well as big brained. I really think he is fond of those little brown people and sympathizes with them in their aspirations for nationality and independence. As governor-general he made the statement, "The Philippines for the Filipinos." And he represents and impersonates, in my judgment, the highest views and the best and most patriotic ideals of the American people toward those insular possessions and the people thereof.

At the business meetings in Manila, where the Congressional committee sat many days listening to the complaints and appeals on the part of representative Filipinos, and at all the banquets and receptions in Manila and throughout the islands where the Taft party was entertained, the Filipino speakers on those occasions practically all, if not all, assumed that they were to be given independence as soon as they demonstrated that they were fitted for it. And while perhaps no definite promises were made them as to what their future status would be, their assumptions and interpretation of the attitude of our adminstration toward them were not questioned. It is the desire of a large and growing element of our people, both Republicans and Democrats, that the time may come, and as rapidly as possible, when those people may prove themselves fitted for self-government; that they may be able to maintain law and order, protect life and property, and by industry and thrift be able to pay the expenses of their own government without the aid of the United States or any other foreign power.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when that time comes—and I trust it may come in the lifetime of some of us when the United States will withdraw its armies and navies from those islands and permit them to establish an independent republic in the Orient and bid them godspeed, with the hope that they may be able to work out their own political destiny without foreign interference—we will need at least one permanent coaling and naval station as a base of supplies in that part of the Orient as a strategic point and for the protection and advancement of our growing commerce in the East.

Mr. TAWNEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL] yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY]?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. In order that there may be no misunderstanding on the part of the Members of the House, I desire to ask the gentleman if he knows that this amendment that is under consideration is not the amendment relating to Subig Bay at all, but to strike out all proposed appropriations for fortifications in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. DRISCOLL. I understand exactly that; but the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] said that the appropriation of $400,000 for seacoast batteries in the Philippine Islands pointed toward the selection of Subig Bay as a permanent station. I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if that is not what he said would be the effect of this appropriation?

Mr. TAWNEY. That certainly would be the effect of it, but it would also have the effect of preventing the expenditure of any money whatever. An amendment is to be offered, I understand, from the other side excepting Subig Bay from the operation of any of this appropriation. I simply want the House to understand that this vote is not to be on the question of Subig Bay or no Subig Bay, but on the question of appropriating that money for the Philippine Islands.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I understand the point involved in this motion and I understand the meaning given to it by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN]. I am against his motion because I want this appropriation made. And if the effect of it will be to select Subig Bay as against Cavite, I will vote for it the more promptly, because I approve of the selection of Subig Bay as against Cavite or any other proposed site in the islands of which I have heard.

Now, when the United States withdraws from the Philippine Islands we will need a permanent station for naval, coaling, and commercial purposes. We can not consistently hold the city of Manila, because that is the largest and practically the only city in the island of Luzon. It is the commercial and industrial center of that island. It practically is Luzon, and it is the metropolis of the archipelago. It would be unreasonable, in case of the withdrawal of our occupation, to hold this city as a permanent possession or dependency or naval station. It would be equally unfair and unreasonable to retain the whole island of Luzon, because that is the largest, most populous, richest, and most advanced of all the islands. The reasons for our not holding Cavite permanently are nearly as cogent. It is located on Manila Bay. Ships approaching Manila and Cavite enter through the same channels. Guns from Cavite could be trained on Manila at any time. When we withdraw we will want to sever our relations with those islands as far as possible and leave them to themselves without interference. The close proximity of Cavite to Manila, the capital of the islands, would be a constant source of irritation and perhaps might lead to international friction and trouble. But Subig Bay is 60 miles away from Manila by water.

Mr. KEIFER. Seventy miles.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Seventy miles.

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; do not change that. Sixty miles, and less than that if anything.

Mr. DRISCOLL. An ex-Speaker of the House, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, says 70 miles.

Mr. KEIFER. Seventy miles by water, as the naval officer told us.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Sixty miles by water and not 40 by land.

Mr. KEIFER. That is the testimony given by the naval officer before our committee.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Well, I am not particularly concerned whether it is 60 or 70 miles by water or 40 or 50 miles by land. No hostile fleet will be apt to enter Manila Bay without first trying titles with our fleet in Subig Bay. No skillful naval officer would be likely to bottle his fleet up in Manila Bay, with danger from torpedoes to every maneuver of his ships, and with the enemy's guns and armies in his front and the enemy's ships in his rear. It is not so far distant but that it will give sufficient protection to Manila while our country's protectorate remains. Nor is it so far as to interfere with the complete control of Manila Bay, its approaches and fortifications, and the protection of their capital, as they may see fit, by the Filipinos.

Olongapo is over the mountain on a remote and unsettled coast of Luzon, and out of sight of the inhabitants, except those who go there expressly to see it. It would be better were there a small island within the same or even a greater distance from Manila, with as good a natural harbor, on which we could construct our naval station, fortifications, and other improvements. Then our naval station, in case of our withdrawal, would be entirely separated from the Filipino possessions; but, unfortunately, there is no such island, and it seems necessary that a naval station be established on the mainland of Luzon. As a consideration of its surrender of its sovereignty by the United States, and the withdrawal of its armies and fleets and the establishment of an independent government, that people will be pleased to cede to us Subig Bay, Olongapo, and sufficient territory in that locality for our use as a permanent naval base. The cost of such station, with complete equipment, is estmated or guessed at all the way from nine to one hundred thousand dollars. If that money be spent at Cavite, it will be lost in case of our withdrawal; if spent in Subig Bay, it will be saved, for we will retain it. Aside from this we have spent and will have spent enough on those islands and their people. I therefore hope that this amendment may fail, and that the amendment to be offered providing that none of this appropriation be spent in the Philippine Islands may also fail. And I further hope that the granting of this appropriation may result in the adoption of Olongapo, on Subig Bay, as a permanent naval, coaling, and commercial station.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the adoption of this amendment. I can not in this five minutes discuss the reasons of our being in the Philippine Islands. I may discuss that later in the day. We are there, and no intelligent American citizen who has spent two or three months in those islands believes that we can get away with honor and without cowardice inside of the next twenty-five years at least. We can not leave these people to cut each other's throats; we can not leave them as a prey of any monarchy that might come along and seize them and hold them to oppress them, with honor to the American people. The American people have already decided that we are there to stay until we accomplish the mission of lifting these men up to where they will be honorable citizens and capable citizens in any country and capable of governing themselves. While I do not believe in the proposition as it comes from the committee, and I hope to see it amended so that none of this money shall be spent for Subig Bay, I think the appropriation in this bill ought to be made, and it ought to be made for use in the Philippine Islands as well as in the Hawaiian Islands. There is plenty of opportunity to use it at Corregidor Island, in the channel of Manila Bay. We ought to fortify that channel; we ought to be able to fortify Manila, the capital city, the chief city, the very heart of the islands, against any foreign foe. If we hold those islands for ten years, we ought to fortify; if we hold them for twenty-five years, we ought to fortify. We owe it to ourselves and owe it to those people, we owe it to the honor of our flag and the honor of the American Army and Navy and the honor of the American people, while we are there, to afford them proper protection. I do not believe this can be done unless we go on with the fortification at Corregidor Island, and therefore I oppose this amendment. I will talk later on the other amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, believing that this debate ought to close, and believing that the other side ought to have the balance of the time, I move that debate on this amendment close in six minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Make it ten.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Unfortunately, much as I should like to do so, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has asked for two or three minutes and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] wants two or three minutes, and now the gentleman from Alabama wants a few minutes, which would make three speeches, and I shall have to insist on the motion that debate close in six minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that debate on this amendment close in six minutes.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes 36.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN (continuing). The ayes have it, and debate is closed in six minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I asked for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Was the gentleman on his feet?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was standing here looking at the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded.

The question was taken, and tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] will please take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and tellers reported—ayes 93, noes 43.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Without objection, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, a moment ago the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] asked me a question the purport of which some gentlemen on this side of the House did not seem to catch. He asked me whether Mr. Bryan was not somewhat responsible for the ratification of the treaty of peace. I answered, as I was forced in truth to answer, that he was, and that, in my opinion, he had made a great mistake. The gentleman from Pennsylvania did not ask me whether Mr. Bryan was in any part responsible for the retention of the Philippine Islands. If he had asked me that question, I would have answered, as nearly as I could remember, in the very language of Mr. Bryan. The reason given by him why he advocated the ratification of the treaty was that it was the best method to prevent the retention of the Philippine Islands. A few days after he had done what he did, when he and I were talking about it, and differing about it, he stated the object he had. A part of that conversation was, as nearly as I can remember, in these words that I am about to repeat, "That he thought the Filipinos were more apt to get from the sense of justice of the American people their independence and freedom than they were to get them from the Spanish and American commissioners." I violate no confidence in repeating that portion of the conversation, because, subsequently, in the public press of the country, he used almost identically the same language. I did not understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania was charging him with being responsible for the retention of the islands. I do not so understand yet. Everybody knows that Mr. Bryan never desired, does not now desire, the Philippines to be or to remain a part of our body politic.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, we have been led away somewhat from the discussion of the amendment; but so much has been said about this treaty that it seems worth while to call attention to the conditions that existed at the time the treaty of Paris was under consideration. At that time the Spanish soldiers were in the field in the Philippine Islands; American soldiers were there, and so were Filipino soldiers. Mr. Bryan, in attempting to get the treaty ratified, did not anticipate the results of that ratification. No Republican has yet dared to charge that Mr. Bryan contributed to the war which was subsequently waged by the United States against the Filipinos in arms—those same Filipinos who for three hundred years had waged unequal war against Spain in order to establish their freedom. Neither Mr. Bryan nor the Democratic party can be properly charged with having contributed to the results that have followed from the treaty of Paris.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. For a question; yes. I have only three or four minutes.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Is the gentleman in favor, and is his party in favor, of immediately giving the Filipinos independence at this time?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I can not answer for the party, but I will say to the gentleman that I am in favor of giving them their independence at the very first opportunity, and would do it now, if I had the opportunity.

Now, Mr. Chairman, neither Mr. Bryan nor the Democratic party approved of the formation of reconcentration camps in the Philippine Islands, nor of the brutalities which were practiced upon the Filipinos by some men, unfortunately, I must say, in the employ of the United States.

The Democratic party does not approve of civilization by fortification nor civilization by cannon. We approve of civilization by education. We do not carp at a single dollar of expenditure in the Philippine Islands for education, but we do object to erecting fortifications there which will permanently enslave the people of the Philippine Islands. [Applause.]

Now, since the treaty of Paris, in all these seven years, no foreign gun has been trained upon the Philippine Islands. There is nothing in this bugaboo that a foreign nation will attempt to seize the Philippine Islands. In my judgment, there is no foreign nation that will take the Philippine Islands as a gift. The best thing that ever happened to poor old Spain was the loss of the Philippine Islands. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, they say the people of the Philippine Islands are unfit for self-government. The English Government has said that same thing about Ireland for more than seven hundred years. The English Government said that about the colonies of the United States. That has always been in the mouth of every tyrant who undertook to deprive a people of the liberty to which they aspired. It will always be the tool with which tyrants keep people in subjection. [Applause.] No people will ever be fit for self-government until they are intrusted with self-government. The men who have the patriotism to wage war against a mighty nation for three hundred years certainly have enough patriotism and intelligence to maintain a government of their own; not a government like that of the most highly civilized nations—such as the United States and Great Britain and France—but a government suited to the people of a tropical country, a government suited to their own ideas, a government that in the process of time will develop to be a satisfactory and sufficient government for those people. [Applause.] And it is because these fortifications will furnish a standing argument against the liberation of the Filipino people that I protest against the passage of this provision, and I trust that this amendment will be agreed to. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. Debate on this amendment has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 91.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. SMITH of Iowa.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 113.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to carry out what is the intention of the Committee on Appropriations. If this amendment be adopted, it will confine that part of the amount contained in this appropriation for the Philippine Islands to Manila. There are several reasons why this should be done now. In the first place, there is in the War Department, allotted to Subig Bay, an unexpended sum of $455,000 for the purpose of fortifications. The committee deemed it unwise at this time to allow anything for Subig Bay for that reason.

Another reason, in my judgment, is that the contemplated programme for a naval station at Subig Bay is of such an extravagant character that no further appropriation should be made until Congress has had some definite action upon the proposed scheme. It has been asserted by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs that there is ample water at Olongapo for a naval station and the docking of vessels. And yet already $55,000 have been appropriated for dredging at Olongapo, and there is pending now before the Naval Committee a request for $250,000 as a part of an appropriation of $1,250,000 for draining and dredging at Olongapo.

The programme for a naval station at Olongapo has been of such an extravagant character that even the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs has never had the courage to take the House into the confidence of his committee and of the Department. The original estimate for a naval station at Subig Bay was $30,000,000. A revised statement brought it down to $12,900,000, and then the Secretary of the Navy revised that so as to bring it to $9,700,000.

The gentleman has been very fond of coming into the House and telling what Admiral Dewey said about one thing or another. I want to place before the House now what Admiral Dewey said to the Committee on Naval Affairs about the scheme of establishing a naval station at Olongapo, and which this House has never heard before.

In 1904 Admiral Dewey was before the Committee on Naval Affairs, and during his examination Mr. Dayton asked this question:

Admiral, let me ask you, can we get along without removing the mountain there, cutting it down in order to get the ground?

Admiral DEWEY. I would cut nothing at all at present. The first scheme proposed was on too large a scale.

Mr. BUTLER. You mean that $30,000,000 scheme?

Admiral DEWEY. Yes. My friend Taylor was on that board, and I said to him at that time, "Of course you will frighten them."

Frighten whom? Frighten the Members of Congress with a scheme or plan to expend $30,000,000 to establish a naval station at Olongapo.

Then the Admiral continued:

Mr. Moody, who is an excellent business man, thinks that a proper plant could be established at Subig Bay for $800,000.

And yet three or four days previously to this testimony Mr. Moody had submitted a revised estimate to the committee, in which he stated that it would cost $9,700,000 to establish this naval station.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. At Subig Bay?

Mr. FITZGERALD. At Subig Bay. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] stated yesterday that the mere fact that estimates were submitted was no guaranty that Congress would make the appropriation. The Committee on Naval Affairs will be compelled to very greatly change its policy if it will do anything to cut down very greatly the enormous estimates submitted from time to time by the Navy Department. Within five or six years they have jumped the naval appropriation bill from $40,000,000 to $100,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] stated that a very modest recommendation would be contained in the naval bill this year for a naval station at Olongapo—$1,000,000 is the lowest estimate submitted this year by the Department to place that station upon a working basis.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the gentleman think if we finally release the Philippine Islands that retaining a naval station right at Manila would be, in effect, overawing the capital of a people that we have freed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not believe that this involves the retention of a naval station at Manila. It is not necessary to say just at present where the naval station will be. I wish to prevent now the carrying out of a policy for a naval station that involves in the future the expenditure of at least $30,000,000.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I think it is ridiculous for the gentleman to refer to that estimate of $30,000,000. Mr. Moody, when he was before the committee and recommended the establishment of this station two years ago—and in pursuance of whose recommendation we at that time made an appropriation of nearly $1,000,000 therefor—brought in an estimate of $9,000,000 covering a course of years. Now, in the judgment of the committee, we do not consider that that is necessary, $9,000,000, not by any means. It rests with the committee of the House to report what, in their judgment, they consider necessay to establish a naval station for temporary repairs over there. It is not proposed to make any permanent repairs whatever, but so long as we have got ships over there the gentleman does not believe that we ought to send them to Hongkong to be docked or to make slight repairs, but certainly we ought to have a little station there and a dock where we could make repairs ourselves.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I stated all of that yesterday, and it is in the RECORD to-day. If the gentleman did not hear what I said he could have read it if he had desired to do so. I also stated yesterday that we have a plant there now which is not a little plant, but, according to the figures sent to the gentleman himself, in the month of January, it is shown that at Cavite the repair work done on ships during the last fiscal year amounted to $556,000. That was practically as much as was done in any naval-repair station in the United States, with the exception of that at New York. It is more than was done at League Island, near Philadelphia. They say they have lots of water at Olongapo, and yet the original estimate was for the removal of 4,100,000 cubic yards of matter, at a cost of about $4,000,000, which included the 900,000 cubic yards of mountain.

Some gentlemen seem to think there is a difference between dredging to make land where you have lots of water and dredging to get deep water where you have lots of land. As I stated yesterday, the reports show that in order to complete this station a mountain must be removed by cutting off a million cubic yards of matter, two rivers must be stopped, and 3,000,000 cubic yards of material must be dredged. Yet gentlemen have the presumption to inform the House that there is no dredging necessary and that there is ample water there. I am in favor of restricting the expenditure of this appropriation at this time, because there is money now available that has not been expended and will not be expended this year, in order to serve notice upon the Departments that before Congress will proceed further with the work of building up the elaborate station in contemplation Congress desires to definitely pass upon this question at a later time. The Admiral of the Navy said that Mr. Moody believed that $800,000 would give us a sufficient station there. Already $900,000 has been appropriated for Olongapo, and not a dollar's worth of work can be done there. It appears conclusively, however, from the reports now before Congress it will take $1,000,000 more before anything can be done. Whatever may be the necessity for establishing a naval base in the Philippine Islands, there is no reason why Congress should proceed with appropriations that practically mean the giving of notice to the Departments that the Olongapo plans have been fully approved. As the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] stated yesterday, it is intended to expend $200,000 of this money in Hawaii and $400,000 in the Philippine Islands. The money can not possibly be expended at Subig Bay within a year, and so there can be no mistake to make clear the intention of Congress that it should not be so expended. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, perhaps better to understand exactly what the state of the proposed appropriation is, as there seems to be some confusion, judging from some of the speeches, I will read the clause found on page 7 of the bill. It is a very brief one and a very simple one. It reads:

For the construction of seacoast batteries in the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands, $600,000.

As it there appears, there is no attempt to say where this money shall be expended. It would be possible to expend the larger part of it in the Hawaiian Islands; it would be possible to expend a considerable part of it, or nearly all that goes to the Philippine Islands, at Manila Bay. It is fair to say that the proposition means that the authorities, those that have had charge of the expenditures of money in the past years, shall have the allotment and application of this $600,000. So far as the present amendment is concerned, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] proposes to cut out, not to reduce, the authorities from allotting or expending any part of the $600,000 at Subig Bay. There has been expended of the appropriation for this year, the year ending June 30, 1906, $455,000. It is said in the testimony that it has been allotted, which is equivalent to its actual expenditure. I hope there will be no confusion in the minds of Members about the use of this word "allotted." What has been "allotted" is an assignment and application of the fund for a particular work already contracted for, and, in effect, it may be said to have been applied and expended.

Often it is reported as moneys in the Treasury when it is substantially all provided for under existing contracts or in view of work already commenced. Now, the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] says that in the defense of these islands we can not rely upon the Army, the strong arm of the Government. I think if we do not make any allotment to Subig Bay to protect it from the landing of a foreign foe, if we are to have one, we will need a very large army to protect Manila, no matter how much money had been expended on fortifications in and around the bay of Manila. This strategic matter, as I understand, has been determined by the naval board, by distinguished naval officers, and by the Taft board, that Subig Bay is more essential to the protection of Manila than fortifications at Manila itself, so far as needing any moneys to be expended. Manila is in a practically good condition for defense against ships on account of the character of the harbor; but Manila would not be capable of defense if a foreign foe could land an army at Subig Bay. Now, this discussion has covered a wide field, and it is not necessary, to my mind, to determine whether or not at some time in the history of the world we shall give up the Philippine Islands. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that we and the Congress of the United States should go dribbling along as we have been doing for some time, talking about giving up the Philippine Islands. We own them as essentially as we own any other territorial property in this country, for it is classed as property.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may have five minutes additional time. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KEIFER. I thank the committee. We own the Philippine Islands. It was said by some gentleman on the other side of the House that we had no authority to govern these insular possessions. It will be found by reference to paragraph 2 of section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution "That the Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting territory or other property belonging to the United States." There has never been any doubt about the authority of the United States to make rules and regulations for the government of any of its possessions. It is put on the basis of property that belongs to the United States, and all concede that these Philippine Islands belong to the United States as essentially as any other property. I might say that for myself originally I was opposed to the idea of taking any possessions from Spain at all, except that island we did not get, to wit, Cuba. I was in favor of taking Cuba and no other islands. It was the gem that we have not taken. I do not care for the little bit of sentiment that was put in at the time we passed the resolution that led to the declaration of war. When war came all conditions changed in this country. Spain, rather than evacuate the West India Islands, rather than leave the American shores, cast down the gage of war, and then all other things were set aside, and as evidence of that we stuck to a little bit of verbal sentiment and did not take Cuba when Spain wanted to surrender her sovereignty to us and when the Cuban insurgents wanted, as I know personally, to be annexed to the United States, and when the Spanish owners of property, and they were the principal owners in all the great cities of Cuba on the coast, wanted to be annexed. I was in favor of annexing Cuba, but the Congress up here had got up a little sentiment and they would not take that which would have been valuable, but reached out and took Porto Rico, although we had said we were not going to war for conquest, and then went off half around the earth and took these Philippine Islands, said to number about 2,000. So we got what we did not go to war for; but now let me say the time has come when we ought to quit this thing of apologizing for having taken them. They are ours. They are under the Constitution and the flag of this country. They came to us, as Parker said in his letter of acceptance, "through the exigencies of war," and it is our duty to take care of them, and let us not be apologizing and saying we would like to have somebody come and steal them away from us or take them by some sort of strategy. Let us not do that, but let us stand up for the patriotism of America, let us now continue to spread the civilization of America over the islands, and, as far as possible, carry the Constitution there and give the blessings that that carries with it to those people as fast as they can appreciate it. When the time comes to give it up it will be when they are ready to have the civilization that we are taking there. That is the point that I complain of to my brethren around me. Some of them say that we have no policy now in the Philippine Islands. I am glad we have none. We ought to have none. They are ours as much as any other country we own or ever did own, and I am in favor of saying we are not ready to withdraw the shield of the Constitution of the United States from those islands or to tear down the flag of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY].

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I voted just now for a proposition that no part of this money should be spent in the Philippine Islands, but I am not willing to vote for this amendment if it means that the money must be spent at Cavite. If it comes down as between spending the money at Subig Bay or at Manila Bay, with the lights now before me I shall support the proposition that it be spent at Subig Bay. [Applause.] In all these matters, Mr. Chairman, we are compelled to seek for light elsewhere. For six or eight years, ever since we have been in the Philippine Islands, the problem has been as to what portion of the islands should be fortified and defended. Several boards have been appointed. There have been Army boards and Navy boards, and there is a joint Army and Navy board, and so far as I know the opinions of these military experts upon these boards has been unanimous that Subig Bay was preferable to Manila Bay. In addition to this, this matter has necessarily been considered and investigated to some extent by the Committee on Naval Affairs for the past four or five years, and almost without exception naval officers have pronounced Subig Bay to be preferable to Manila Bay. I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, that this item of appropriation for fortifications should be held up until the question is definitely decided. But I am not willing that the Department shall be forbidden to spend it at Olongapo and inferentially given the authority to spend it in Manila Bay.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much do you propose to spend there?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]?

Mr. RIXEY. Certainly.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Does the gentleman recognize the necessity of fortifying Manila Bay, for this is a question of fortification, whether Subig Bay is fortified or not? Would it not leave Manila Bay, the capital of the archipelago, with 250,000 people, undefended at Corregidor, at the entrance of the bay? It would cost more than this appropriation to do that.

Mr. RIXEY. It was stated by a number of gentlemen on the other side of this House that one objection to spending this money at Manila Bay is that we might eventually desire to retire from the Philippine Islands. I think we ought to retire, and retire at once, but even if there is a hope of retiring in the future—if we are ever to retire from the islands—we can not hold Manila Bay, and the only naval base that we could have, so far as Manila is concerned, or near Manila, would be Subig Bay.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. But the gentleman does not answer my question. My question is this: Would you leave Manila to be undefended and spend all the money in Subig Bay?

Mr. RIXEY. The opinion of naval experts and of this joint board was that when you defended Subig Bay you would also defend Manila Bay.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Thirty-six miles away?

Mr. RIXEY. Thirty-six miles away. And officers who appeared before the Naval Committee stated that, in their judgment, fortifications and a fleet at Subig Bay would be a defense for Manila.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES]?

Mr. RIXEY. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much do you propose to spend in improving Subig Bay? I believe that is the same place as Olongapo. How much money do you propose to spend now and hereafter?

Mr. RIXEY. I understand that this provision provides for $400,000 for Olongapo.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. This amendment prevents the carrying out of that intention.

Mr. RIXEY. I understand that $400,000 of the $600,000 is intended for the Philippine Islands.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Six hundred thousand dollars for Hawaii and the Philippine Islands.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to find out how much is proposed to be expended at Subig Bay now and hereafter in order to improve it as we desire to improve it.

Mr. RIXEY. For naval station and fortifications?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. RIXEY. Well, the estimates have run all the way from $30,000,000 down. I believe it will be up rather than down in the final cost. But if it costs $30,000,000 it had better be established there than at Cavite, if the latter place is unfit for the purpose.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] suggests $30,000,000 up. That means if the Republicans are in power and $30,000,000 down if the Democrats are in power.

Mr. RIXEY. Now, I want to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] offers an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. RIXEY. My amendment is to add after the last word of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] the words "or at Cavite or Manila Bay."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the amendment the words "or at Cavite or Manila Bay."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia to the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. RIXEY. I would like to have it all read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the passage as it would read if the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York as amended by the gentleman from Virginia should be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 7, line 21, add:

"Provided, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be expended at Subig Bay or at Cavite or Manila Bay."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, of course this last amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] is for the purpose of defeating the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. The gentleman from Virginia very frankly says that he is opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. Now he wants to load it down with this other amendment, that no money shall be expended at Manila Harbor in any way, in order that it may go down in the House, because that is quite equivalent to saying that none of this money shall be expended in the Philippine Islands for any other project now in sight.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to differ with the Committee on Appropriations, as I always am with any committee of this House that has given the subject examination; and when I found that they had reported this bill in the shape that they did, I looked into it and looked into the hearings before that committee to see why it was they leave this appropriation in this loose and indefinite way, with the evident intention of leaving it to the War Department to expend a portion of this money at Subig Bay. I read over the hearings before that committee, and they gave me no light whatever on the subject. There is nothing in those hearings that will induce any man to vote in favor of an appropriation for Subig Bay. I happened to be with my distinguished friend from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the day after he made that famous sea trip of his to Olongapo, after he had carefully investigated that matter. Of course, I knew that he became an expert on naval stations and naval affairs because of his long and honorable service as chairman of that great Committee on Naval Affairs, and I wanted to find from him what light he had acquired on this question. I then found his mind in a condition of doubt and uncertainty. If we had not expended any money there, I have no doubt but what the gentleman from Illinois would have opposed it strenuously then and continue to oppose it now. But the gentleman may not, on account of his naval experience, perhaps, be willing to spend money at Subig Bay. There are some mountains rising out of the bay that we saw afterwards. Although we did not get within 4 or 5 miles of them, we could see them at the time, 4 or 5 miles away from where the ship was, in the daytime, and we would have had to be a good deal farther away than that if we could not see the mountains. It seems, from what was said to us by Army officers and had been said over time and again, that they had to move a mountain into the sea in order to make land on which to hitch a naval station.

Mr. FOSS. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. FOSS. It is not true, as I understand the situation. We have to-day 410 acres of level land that are at Olongapo, in Subig Bay.

Mr. PAYNE. Distance seems to have added to the land since the chairman of the committee was there.

Mr. FOSS. The land is as level land as it is possible to find anywhere else where you would have a naval station.

Mr. PAYNE. We have to move off the side of a hill.

Mr. FOSS. Now, in regard to the rocks that they take out there, they will use that in the construction of the buildings.

Mr. PAYNE. Why, of course, they would use whatever material they had. This is a pretty good-sized hill, and they call it a "mountain;" it is a pretty large-sized hill; it may not be of the dignity of most of the mountains found in the Philippine Islands, but sufficiently large to bury the thirty, forty, seventy-five, or one hundred million dollars that this improvement will cost at Olongapo, if we get fairly started into it.

Mr. FOSS. Does not the gentleman think we can decide how much shall be spent here in this House, year by year, as the matter comes up, and how much of a station we shall have at Olongapo?

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman appeals to me, of course I must say I am not an expert; I have not been on the Naval Committee.

Mr. FOSS. So far as this year is concerned, all that the committee propose allowing for this improvement is simply a pier that is to cost $65,000 to connect the dock with the shore, and $100,000 for tools in order to repair our ships that will be there in dock, and that is the extent the committee proposes to recommend and the naval bill will carry.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question. You were speaking a moment ago about removing a mountain to make a site for a fortification. I would say to the gentleman, for his information, that General Mackenzie has just informed me they have already selected all the site that will be necessary for the batteries, which the board of officers has claimed is required at this particular point, without excavation.

Mr. PAYNE. For the batteries, yes; but this is for the naval station.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. These are only necessary to defend the naval station. Mr. Chairman, because of the whispering that is occurring in the House it was impossible for me to hear exactly what the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota were. Does the statement of General Mackenzie apply to Subig Bay?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. But not to the naval station?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is a question of fortification.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course they can hitch a battery on a hillside or mountain—and they will do so when they have it anywhere in Subig Bay—and then prepare a place to protect the harbor; and when they get sufficient batteries to protect the mouth of the harbor and the harbor from the sea, they have not batteries then to protect from a land force that may come over the hills and mountains from the mainland; and generals tell me—I do not know it myself, but it looks like common sense—that it is impossible to fortify this place against a land force. When they say that, I think they have said what is correct.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Is it possible to fortify Manila against the advance of a land force?

Mr. PAYNE. Manila is perfectly level all around. Not only 400 acres, but 40,000 acres or 100,000 acres.

Mr. FOSS. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to use some of the five minutes or have five minutes more.

Mr. FOSS. The gentleman says it would be impossible to fortify this place against a land force. Now, I want to ask the gentleman what our Army would be doing there with 14,000 troops and 87 Army stations scattered all over the islands?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. And a thousand marines.

Mr. PAYNE. I am talking about what the Army officers say. I am not an expert on this subject, but it seems to me that you would have to have not only 14,000, but many more soldiers there than we have.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from New York is an old soldier, and I should like to have his personal opinion as a soldier.

Mr. PAYNE. I can not plead guilty to being an old soldier, and I can not give any further personal opinion on this fortification than I have already given.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I want a little information. We have had an investigation before our committee, in which we ascertained the fact that there was but one substantial coal field in the whole archipelago, and that on the island of Batan. Certain Spaniards have an option on that land. We are going to recommend that the Government make an appropriation of $50,000 for the purpose of closing that option, so that the Government shall have control of that coal field.

It further developed in the investigation that there was already a magnificent harbor there and that the coal lay in close proximity to the harbor.

Mr. PAYNE. I was going to ask about that; but I had just as lief the gentleman would make my speech, if he will talk a little louder, so that everybody can hear him.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I want to know, if we are going to have only one fortified station there, why we should not put it on that island where the coal is, and where the harbor is?

Mr. PAYNE. If I did not understand that many naval officials condemned this proposition, I should speak with great hesitation as against this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have ten minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York have ten minutes additional. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I should like to know if the same conditions that apply at Manila would not apply to Boston or New York? Do we fortfy any of our cities from the land side? And, furthermore, would there not be a fleet in Subig Bay that would be apt to defend it from the land side?

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Chairman, of course the conditions are different in the United States from those in Manila or in the Philippine Islands. We have an Army here, we have an organized militia, and then we have a few millions of citizen soldiers who are ever ready to spring into action, and it would be pretty difficult for any foreign enemy to exist anywhere on the land of the United States long enough to take any of those cities.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Does not the gentleman think we have an Army large enough in Manila, and always will have, to defend it from any land force?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not; and I base my opinion on what these Army officers have said and not on my own experience or knowledge of the case.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it would seem to me a much better proposition to fortify and make a naval station at the island of Batan. They have there the finest coal in the whole archipelago—finer coal, it is said, than that in Australia, which is the best that is now available anywhere in the Orient. It has been investigated by the United States engineers. They have drilled in various parts of the island sufficiently to develop the fact that there is an almost inexhaustible supply of coal there; they say coal enough to last for three hundred years, so far as they have already investigated. There is a beautiful harbor there, they say, and that fact seems not to be disputed. Adjacent to the harbor there is a Spanish land claim, given by the Spanish Government, which seems largely to cut off the coal in the rear, which the Government owns. The Government of the United States owns the whole island except this Spanish claim. They have an option on that claim which expires on the 1st of March, and is depending upon the action of Congress as to whether it shall be wiped out or not. If we do wipe it out, we shall own the whole island and all the coal on it and have free access to the harbor. This option can be wiped out for $50,000. Of course, after this exploration of the island by the engineers this Spanish claim is worth much more money than that, and I hope Congress will appropriate the $50,000.

Mr. MADDEN. What would be the value of the land per acre in the neighborhood of this 300-acre tract?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think that is a question to be asked or answered. Of course, if you take into consideration the coal that is there, the engineers and the Army officers say that it would not take long to get back the $50,000, and a good many times the $50,000, which this Spanish claim will cost; but that is a matter for the future. Whether the United States shall mine this coal or whether they shall lease it upon a royalty for the coal that is to be gotten out is another question; but there is coal right there for the naval station, for the repair shops, if you locate them there, coal contiguous to the harbor; and it is easy to fortify this harbor on this island, which, I believe, is about 8 or 10 miles long and 3 or 4 miles wide.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How does the gentleman know that there is coal there?

Mr. PAYNE. I know from the report of Lieutenant Wigmore, who was at the head of some engineers who have been experimenting there for the last two or three years; I know it by personal conversation with him.

Mr. GRAHAM. They have been using diamond drills there and developing this coal.

Mr. GRAFF. How far is it from Manila?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know. They have drilled it and developed the fact that the coal is there, and they say that the quality of the coal is the best that can be got for ship purposes anywhere in the eastern waters.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows how far it is from Manila Bay?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, it is several hundred miles.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is 500 miles.

Mr. MADDEN. Near enough so that the fortifications would do for Manila Bay?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no; it is 500 miles from there, but there could be a naval station there well fortified. There is another island, the island of Paliwan, where there is as good a harbor as there is in the whole archipelago. It is a small, narrow island, where it could not be approached from the mainland, where it could be easily fortified, and I believe it is only about 100 miles from Manila.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Right in the path of commerce coming around the straits?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; right adjoining the China Sea, and is as available a place, it would seem to a man who is not an expert on these matters, as Subig Bay, and so much more easily fortified.

Now, my thought was, Mr. Chairman, being in the condition of mind that my friend from Illinois was the day after he was there—very doubtful whether we ought to go on with this matter, whether we should spend another dollar in Subig Bay—that we had better adopt this amendment offered by the gentleman from New York; that no money should be spent out of this appropriation at Subig Bay, and let them have another examination by experts who will go upon the ground and report from what they have seen, and not report from what they have not seen, in reference to Subig Bay and other points that have been suggested in this island for fortification, and see what is best to be done.

In the meantime, the whole of this appropriation to be apportioned to the Philippine Islands can be used—for it is much less than was asked for—it can be used for Corregidor Island and Manila Bay. Let the appropriation remain in the bill and let them spend it at Corregidor Island, because, whether or not we stay there a year or twenty-five years, we should protect Manila Bay, and we can do it only by appropriating the money for it.

But whether we have a naval station at Manila Bay, at Cavite, or at the island of Paliwan or the island of Batan, let us have a joint report from the Army and Navy as to what is best to be done. This House should have the best information that can be got, and not take this report, which is so much questioned now by officers of the Army and officers of the Navy, some of whom have reported against it since the report was made by those who have been in charge. Let the House be in full possession of the facts, and then if Subig Bay is the best place, I am for Subig Bay. In the meantime, if we have got to build a dock for the dry dock, if we can't anchor it without building a dock, why, let us build the dock; it is a matter of only $65,000 compared with an expenditure of millions. In the meantime we can make an investigation and see whether it is best to go on and spend all the money that is asked for for Subig Bay or whether it is best to get some other place in the Philippine Islands for a naval station. Let us have the report of the experts after they have gone there and investigated and made an examination, and have something that will not be questioned by every officer that visits the islands, and who will not leave, as the chairman of the Naval Committee did, in doubt after he had spent a whole day there investigating.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I am unable to understand the attitude of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] on this amendment, or on this provision of the bill. From his statement it would seem that the Committee on Appropriations, in reporting this appropriation in the language it has, is subject to criticism. He says that it is this "loose and indefinite" language in which the appropriation is made that prompted him to investigate the matter, and then said that that was the reason for his opposition to this provision.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call his attention to the fact that in all the fortification bills that have been considered in this House since he has been a Member of it no fortification bill has contained more specific language as to the particular locality in which the money was to be expended than this particular item does. The last fortification bill provided "for construction of seacoast batteries in our insular possessions," leaving the matter of the expenditure of that money wholly and exclusively within the discretion of the War Department, and in the investigation which the committee made we found that under that language a part of that appropriation was expended at Guantanamo, Cuba, although it is questionable whether that was ever intended. In order to limit the localities in which this money should be expended, the committee, contrary to all precedent and expressly, provided that this money shall be expended in the Philippines and Hawaii. I desire to call the attention of Members of the House to the fact that the question of the purchase of coal lands in the Philippine Islands on the island of Batan is not involved in this discussion; it is not involved in the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], nor is the fortification of any particular place in the Philippines involved. Nor do we provide that any part of this money appropriated shall be expended at Subig Bay, at Cavite, or at any other place. There has been $1,400,000 already appropriated for fortifications in the Philippine Islands, and that money has been distributed by the board having control of these expenditures. It will be used where, in the judgment of that board, it is most expedient and for the best interests of the Government to expend it.

Now, the question is simply this: Are we now going to depart still further from the accustomed and established practice of allowing those who have expert knowledge, who have experience, and whose duty it is to determine the best places for fortifying, or are we going to undertake to determine that this particular place or that particular place shall not have any part of this money expended on it? Then what would the result be? There are not ten men in this House to-day, not even the Members who visited the Philippine Islands, that agree on this question of whether Subig Bay should be fortified or not, except in this, that it is generally agreed that if the Philippine Islands should ever be surrendered by the Government of the United States we will forever maintain a naval station in those islands, and that Subig Bay is the place that ought to be selected. In that event the fortification should be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Just one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that his time may be extended for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to repeat this—that we are not determining upon the purchase of coal lands in the Philippine Islands; we are not determining upon whether this money should be expended at this place or that place. But the board that has been created for the purpose of ascertaining the points or places at which these fortifications should be constructed has unlimited discretion, and, in the judgment of all preceding Congresses, it has been deemed wise that that discretion should rest in that board. If they find that Subig Bay is the most desirable place to fortify, this money will be expended there. On the contrary, if the Army officers, as the distinguished gentleman from New York says, have condemned this place, then not a dollar of this money will be used in fortifications there. It is only in the event that the board of Navy and Army officers finally agree that Subig Bay is the best place for a naval station that any of this money will be expended for the purpose of fortifications at this point.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for ten minutes instead of five, and then I promise that I will not ask for any further extension.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to assume a great deal upon anything which I have seen in the Philippine Islands. The gentleman in charge of this bill seems to have had his wrath greatly excited in the early part of the day because some members of the committee have spoken of something that they saw themselves. I do not know that it is any worse to make a statement based on your own best judgment of what you saw than it is to make a statement that evidently shows that you don't know anything about it and have not had any opportunity to know. [Laughter.] Now, if this was a question of establishing a naval station at Subig Bay, under certain circumstances I would not put up my judgment against that of a so-called "expert," even though I had an opportunity to talk and get testimony far better than any that you can get under the eaves of the Department of the Navy in the city of Washington. Give me the ear of a naval officer of great experience in the Philippine Islands, who talks in confidence and trusts you to maintain his confidence, and he will tell you a great many things that you will never get in the committee room in this Capitol, with the Navy Department reading the testimony the next morning.

But if it was the establishment ultimately of a naval station at Subig Bay I would not put up my judgment against that of the distinguished Admiral of the Navy, although he was about as near to the interior of Subig Bay as——

Mr. FOSS. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. FOSS. That I may ask that a letter from Admiral Dewey be read upon this question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no; I could not. You can not take me off the floor.

Mr. FOSS. If it is read, I think the gentleman will withdraw his remark.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not yield for that purpose. Admiral

Dewey at the time he went after the fleet of the enemy entered Subig Bay and reached with his ship about the place where the island is stationed, and I have it from a Member of this House who was present that the exploration, the whole of it, was not for the purpose of establishing a naval station—he was not up there to examine the character of the surroundings, but he was there to find out a single fact, and that was whether the Spanish fleet was in Subig Bay or not.

Mr. FOSS. May I interrupt at that point? I have a letter here which covers the whole question——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not want that letter read in my time. You can put it in in your own time and at the same time couple it with the statement you made as to the Logan after we had left Subig Bay the last time you were there, and if you do that the rest of us will be thoroughly vindicated, and here are the witnesses all around me.

Mr. FOSS. I do not know to what statement the gentleman refers.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The strongest opponent of Subig Bay, and that was when the Logan had cleared the jaws of the harbor, was the distinguished gentleman, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House.

Mr. FOSS. I must respectfully disagree with the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, I have the evidence here and I heard it testified to repeatedly since I began this talk; but that is not important now. [Applause and laughter.] Neither one of us knows too much about Subig Bay. Admiral Dewey may have gone back there, and I would rather trust Admiral Dewey's long-range opinion than mine; he knows a great deal more about it; but now I am going to talk about the question of the appropriation of this money and the fortification of Subig Bay. You are going to fortify Subig Bay for the purpose of protecting Manila. How would it do to fortify Snickers Gap to protect Washington? There is absolutely an equal and correct illustration. How would it do to build a battery at the city of Baltimore to protect the capital of the United States? How would it do to put it down at Washington Junction? That is not so far away as Subig Bay is from Manila. What do you want fortifications there for? Why, to protect the Navy, you say. To protect the Navy. Who will protect the batteries? You want to protect the Navy, and you have a navy there not for the purpose of active operations in Subig Bay, but for the purpose of sending down to Manila to protect Manila.

Now, let me call your attention to the question of what you are embarking upon. Subig Bay is surrounded, as my colleague here [Mr. HEPBURN], who is a pretty level-headed man, says, by some twenty-five to forty rough points upon the mountains surrounding it, all of them pointing directly into the harbor, so you have got to fortify not only the batteries at the water line, but you have got to put batteries not on a thousand hills but on about as many hills as there were around Jerusalem before you have got this protection in a protected position. Now, then, you are going to protect against what? Do you want to protect the Navy against some other navy if it comes in there? Do you think that there will ever be a fleet of ours bottled up inside of Subig Bay so that you must have land batteries planted upon the hills around there to protect the Navy? My proposition is this: Let us decide ultimately what we are going to do about the naval station, not one that the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Naval Committee, is talking about, with two or three million dollars—I heard a distinguished naval officer, whose name I would not repeat for any consideration in the world, say that entering upon this was the entering wedge of a hundred million dollars, and the gentleman from Connecticut heard the same statement, and that he had not any hesitation about saying that before you could make it a safe place of rendezvous for our Navy, and march from there and go 60 or 70 miles down to Manila while an enemy's fleet was ravishing the city of Manila, you would have to spend a hundred million dollars to make it a sort of place that would be fitted for the purpose you are seeking to accomplish.

So I do not believe that until we have established our plans in regard to this matter we ought to thus throw $400,000 of money recklessly into an appropriation for the establishment of batteries there until we know what we want them for. Nobody will ever go into Subig Bay in order to reach Manila, for they can not get over the mountains. They can not get out of there with any kind of munitions or transportation of any character. It is simply a place or rendezvous, and I have no doubt the truth is—and I have no doubt the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] knows it as well as I do—that the original scheme was simply a proposition looking to the abandonment of the Philippine Islands and the location of a mere coaling station at Subig Bay. And all this supplemental talk and consideration about protecting the city of Manila, which is 60 or 70 miles away, is all an afterthought and has not the slightest possible justification in any principle that I can possibly understand.

I have no objection to trusting the Army people with the expenditure of money, but I think we ought to know just exactly what is to be done with this money and what is to be the future proposition with regard to the whole line of defense of the Philippine Islands. I do not believe a thing of this idea that you must not let the other people know. Why, you can not mark out a fortification, you can not mark out a position or plant a single battery that the Japanese and the Chinese and the Germans and the British and everybody else will not know just exactly the size of the work. That would have done in the olden time; it would have done in the pod-auger days and in the days of the wooden plows and the Dilworth spelling book, but it will not do in these modern times, when the size of every ship is known by the whole world.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I understand that one amendment here would confine the appropriation for fortifications to Manila and the other would confine it to Subig Bay. I hope both amendments will be adopted, and then we will be brought back to what I think ought to be the Democratic position—that no fortification will be appropriated for in the Philippine Islands. I think that ought to be the Democratic position on the question, and after hearing the debates upon that side of the House I think that you should come to the same conclusion, for this debate has shown a great uncertainty of mind as to the wisdom of appropriating money for the one place or the other. And if there ever was a case where legislators ought to make haste slowly it seems to me that this is the case. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs yesterday quoted Secretary Moody, Admiral Dewey, and the joint board of Army and Navy officers in favor of Subig Bay. Some of the gentlemen on the other side have quoted eminent authorities against Subig Bay and in favor of Manila, and some even have gone so far as to intimate that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] might be quoted against himself on that proposition. In that state of affairs, it seems to me, this House ought not to vote any appropriation for fortifying the Philippine Islands, but we ought to wait until a competent officer or a competent board should determine which of the two places is the better, or if there is a third place which is better than either, and then let us appropriate according to such report. I know that gentlemen upon that side of the House are just as sick and tired of holding the Philippine Islands as we are on this side and as the country at large is.

You have taken hold of the positive and negative poles of the electric battery which you call "manifest destiny," and which we call "lust of empire," and you declare that the Almighty God has turned the current of electricity on, and you are now praying to the Almighty to turn the current off so that you can let go. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would not like to see Manila fortified in any event, because I believe that fortifications at Manila, regardless of the question of expense, spells the permanent enslavement of the people of the Philippine Islands. I believe the nations of Europe will so regard the fortification of Manila, and for that reason, if for no other, I should oppose that. I trust that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] will be adopted by the House.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If this $400,000 is to go to Manila or to Subig Bay, where does the gentleman say it ought to go as between the two, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. After listening carefully to the debate, and from what I learned as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I would pronounce unhesitatingly in favor of Subig Bay. And for still another reason. If the money is spent at Subig Bay, then in the event of the relinquishment of the Philippine Islands no one can say that a dollar of the public money has been wasted. We will have to have a naval station and a coaling station at all events. We can have them at Subig Bay, and if we appropriate money for fortifications at Manila, that would be regarded as having been done for the purpose of protecting the principal city of the Philippine Islands, and the people of the Philippine Islands might look upon those fortifications with the realization that their hope of ultimate liberty is forever lost. For that reason I trust that no fortification at Manila will be appropriated for.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I want to repeat again what I think ought to be fully understood—and I find it is not—and that is that the appropriation proposed in this bill is an appropriation of $600,000 to be expended, not at Subig Bay, not at Cavite, not at Manila, not in the Hawaiian Islands, but wherever those in authority in these matters, as in the past, may choose to apply it.

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Has not all the money that has been allotted for Subig Bay been allotted under an appropriation exactly similar in character, except it did not go so far even as to restrict it to the Philippine Islands and Hawaii?

Mr. KEIFER. That is true, Mr. Chairman, and that is the very good reason why the gentleman from New York should not have said there is no reason now for having any portion of this money applied at Subig Bay, because I understand that he, as well as others, in the past voted for these appropriations, $455,000 of which have been applied at Subig Bay already. And also we have that great dry dock, that is somewhere on the billows between here and the Philippine Islands, that is going to Subig Bay, and which cost more than a million of dollars. It is going there, and those who know tell me that there is no other place to take it in the Philippine Islands but Subig Bay—that there is no place it can be taken on Manila Bay.

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. If that dry dock does not encounter storms and gets there in due time, will it not arrive there before this appropriation, or even a dollar of it, could be allotted to Subig Bay?

Mr. KEIFER. I am not sure about that; but it may be allotted as soon as the bill becomes a law. I am not responsible for the $455,000 which has already been practically applied to fortifications at Subig Bay. I am not responsible for the million and more dollars paid for the dry dock that is now being carried across the seas to Subig Bay, and to no other place.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We are all agreed that Pearl Harbor and the surroundings there ought to be fortified. Now, why not spend the whole $600,000 given in the bill for the fortification of that harbor and fix it so that the battle ships can get into it, and then by the next session maybe you gentlemen on the other side can get together and say what policy shall be agreed on with reference to the Philippine Islands?

Mr. KEIFER. I hope the gentleman will go up there to the War Department—to those who are capable of deciding these questions—and make his speech to them, because they have authority to expend this $600,000 in the Hawaiian Islands or the Philippine Islands.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I will make the speech to them on this question as sure as you are living.

Mr. KEIFER. I will be glad when you do. I want to read a word to the gentleman from New York. He says he sees no reason why this money should be appropriated to be applied at Subig Bay. Unfortunately the gentleman did not read what is contained in the hearings, or if he did he did not read it carefully, or he would not say that, unless he means to repudiate the learned men who have devoted their time and attention and given all their talents to determine whether or not it was wise to go to Subig Bay. They say that Subig Bay is 70 miles by actual water travel from Manila. Now, on page 47 of this testimony, General Mackenzie says:

> The naval members of this Taft board have ranked Subig Bay——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Ohio be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Ohio be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KEIFER. I will finish the reading:

> The naval members of the Taft board have ranked Subig Bay as one of the three most important harbors to be fortified we have.

Mr. PAYNE. Read the next two lines.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman will make his own speech when it comes to that. [Laughter.] He wants me to read more. Mr. GRAFF asked the question: "Why?" General Mackenzie answered:

> On account of its being an important naval station.

Now, I have read that to console the gentleman. It is because it is an important naval station in the judgment of the naval members of the Taft board. But we did not learn much in this Congress from that distinguished galaxy of men who left this country last summer. I could not go there with them and see something about our island possessions on the other side of the world. They have, however, come home quarreling with themselves. [Laughter.] Why, my brother from Ohio says on one occasion the committee met at Subig Bay and the chairman of the Naval Committee had one opinion and when he gets home he testifies to another. [Laughter.] Now, just think of this, from my distinguished friend from Ohio, when we all remember that one of the things he boasted about on this floor but a few days ago was the fact that he always was royally inconsistent all his life. [Great laughter.] Gentlemen tell us that the one thing now for us to do, while we have an opportunity, is to buy some coal lands. Somebody who can pronounce the name do so for me——

Mr. PAYNE. Batan.

Mr. KEIFER. Batan Island. Somebody says that is the place to fortify. It is about 500 miles away only from Manila Bay. That is certainly a great place to fortify. [Laughter.] It is an island 5 or 6 miles long and 2 or 3 miles wide. You could sail around it and fire shots from modern naval guns clear over and through it in every direction [laughter]; and it is only 500 miles away. What would that amount to as a fortification? I may know but little about fortifications. I have been outside of them more than inside. I want to be outside of them always. [Great laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the point about it is that we should appropriate this money and let it be used as has been the custom of Congress in past years, to be applied as those who are charged with the expenditures of money should deem proper.

We have entered upon this matter of fortifications at Subig Bay. They say it is to be a naval station; not to protect our war ships so much as it is to protect that place from the landing of foreign troops.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If some men should land at Subig Bay, where would they go and how would they get there?

Mr. KEIFER. I do not think the gentleman went across those high hills that he magnifies. I understand he was within 5 miles of that place and not on the hills at all. [Laughter.] General Mackenzie said in his testimony that it was essential to the defense of Manila to keep a foreign army from making a landing and threatening Manila. I understand it is about 40 miles by land from Subig Bay to Manila.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does the gentleman mean to say that there is a possibility of landing troops in Subig Bay?

Mr. KEIFER. That is the testimony of those who know.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote in favor of this amendment to eliminate Subig Bay from the provisions of this appropriation. I shall vote against the Subig Bay proposition in the fulfillment of my duty as a Member of Congress. I believe it is an unwise appropriation or series of appropriations to enter upon. I believe that this and some previous appropriations in a similar direction will ultimately involve this Government in the expenditure of a hundred million dollars, and I am not willing to do that. I think we can well take this day and several more days before we enter upon a path which we must follow to the end after we once begin it. I went to Subig Bay with the Taft party with this understanding, and this understanding only, that in pursuance of a letter submitted to the party we were to express our opinion and form our conclusions so that we might vote intelligently here in Congress after we got back upon the policy of proceeding with the fortification of Subig Bay and the establishment of a naval station there.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will you state to the committee how near Subig Bay you were?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I will before I get through.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. May I inquire how this hundred million dollars could be expended there?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I will tell you before I get through, if I have time.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. The estimate is $10,000,000, and a pretty complete estimate, too.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I remember distinctly some three or four years ago an estimate was published in the papers at least—whether it got any further or not—that the Navy Department had prepared a recommendation for a naval station at Subig Bay, to cost between thirty and forty million dollars.

Mr. MUDD. It never got to the Department.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I think the engineers were instructed to make a revised and lower estimate, and that as a result of that recommendation there is now pending before the Naval Committee a proposition to expend $10,000,000 for a naval station there. So that you see you are looking to an expenditure of $10,000,000 anyhow, whether any more or not.

Now, we did not and could not make a very careful examination of Subig Bay. I am going to try to present it to you just as it presented itself to me when I saw it. We sailed up the coast from Manila Bay, from Corregidor Island, until we came to the entrance, and we found a narrow entrance, perhaps half or three-quarters of a mile wide, flanked on the left by high mountains, from which a rifleman, standing at the top of them, could make it impossible for a steersman to go through that channel. On the other side is a flat island, and beyond that island a passage for water only, filled with reefs, so that no vessels could enter it. The passage must be through this narrow channel, and General Corbin told us that this island at the entrance was the place where the fortifications were to be constructed. In the rear of that island there is already a pier built to enable the Army authorities to get onto that island with the tools and implements that are necessary to carry on the fortifications. So that is the place where this money will be expended if you appropriate it.

Now, what have you got when you get beyond that? You go in through that long, narrow channel and open out into a magnificent bay—a delightful spot. Because of a severe thunder storm which came up at the time, we did not go to the landing place where the naval station was to be established, but we were told by gentlemen now on this floor, and told by Army and Navy officers, that the land where the naval station was to be built was so uncertain in its character that it would have to be made over again, at a probable expenditure of about a million dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Connecticut have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Connecticut be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would like to say that if a naval officer or Army officer does not approve of this place for fortification or for a naval station not a dollar of this money will be expended there. The gentleman made the statement a moment ago that this appropriation would be expended at this particular point. What basis has he for making that statement?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. On the basis of a statement made to me on the spot by an Army officer. The work is already begun there; the piers are built to put the guns ashore.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we were told another thing—that it would be necessary to make the actual ground or land upon which the naval station was to be placed, for the land is not solid enough to support the buildings; and that it would also be necessary to change the course of a river.

Mr. FOSS. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Yes; if you will not take too much of my time.

Mr. FOSS. Just one question.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I am trying to give the reasons that cause me to vote as I am going to vote.

Mr. FOSS. I want to ask the gentleman whether it was an Army officer or a naval officer who told him that?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I want to say that what has been stated by other gentlemen is, in my judgment, true—that it would be absolutely impossible to defend Subig Bay against a land attack, and the whole proposition that was submitted to that party was this: If we are in the future to leave the Philippine Islands, is this a proper place for a naval station? Not that we should go ahead and do it anyway. I am one of those who believe the time will never come when the United States will leave the Philippine Islands. [Applause.] Consequently, the question has ceased to be one of interest except on the score of economy, saving as much of the proposed expenditure of fifty or a hundred million dollars as possible. After we came out of the bay we held a meeting of two hours or more in discussion of the subject.

We discussed the question two hours, and at the close of this meeting I turned to General Corbin, the department commander, and asked this question: "I would like, General Corbin, your opinion on this proposition as to whether it will be necessary to fortify Manila Bay if Subig Bay is fortified and defended." His reply was that it would be necessary to defend and fortify Manila Bay in any event. So it was to be simply a double expenditure. I am in favor of keeping this amount of $600,000 in the bill, and I agree with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] that this and more should be expended either at Pearl Harbor or at Manila Bay.

But I believe, gentlemen, you will be doing an unwise and imprudent thing if you go ahead and gradually, by the expenditure of a hundred thousand this year and a hundred thousand next year, get this Government committed to a lump expenditure of $100,000,000 at Subig Bay, as, in my judgment, will be necessary if you begin upon it. You will make a great mistake. Do the duty that lies before you now. Defend Pearl Harbor and Manila Bay, and leave Subig Bay for future consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to what the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] has said with reference to this matter, and I agree with him heartily as to what he says about Subig Bay; but I think this question of fortifying the Philippine Islands is one that the House should decide, and decide definitely.

A large number of gentlemen on that side of the House, every Member practically on this side, say that at some time they hope to see the Philippine Islands independent. Now, we have spent millions of dollars on the Philippine Islands already. If we attempt to fortify the Philippine Islands as against a foreign invasion, it will cost a hundred million dollars or more. It will cost more to fortify these islands against a foreign enemy than it would to fortify the entire coast of the United States.

There is no danger of any country in the world interfering with our possessions in the Philippine Islands in the immediate future. We are not at war with anyone; we do not expect to go to war with anyone. If we did have a foreign war to-day, or at any time within the next ten years, no matter what our policy is, there are two great nations that now have navies that are so much superior to ours that if we went to war with them it would be necessary for us to call our naval forces back to the United States and abandon the defense of the Philippine Islands. There is no question about that. With any other nations on the face of the earth we could protect the Philippine Islands with our present Navy.

Now, if we ever expect to surrender these islands to the people themselves, to separate their government from ours, is it wisdom on our part to go about a general scheme of fortifications for the Philippine Islands? I think clearly it is not. Then what do we want to fortify there? It seems to me there is but one feasible proposition, and that is, to fortify a naval base. Manifestly, if we intend ever to give freedom to the Philippine Islands, Cavite in not the place. That would be the capital of the Philippine Islands, and if we had our fortifications there, it would threaten their government. It would be unfair and unjust to them to fortify any place near Manila as a naval base for our own country. I think it is manifest, from what we have heard on the floor here to-day, that Subig Bay is not the place, because it will cost millions to start the naval fortifications, and then it would not be fortified against a land attack. I think it would be very proper, if we could find the proper place, to fortify a naval station there for the operations of our Navy in the future and for a base of supplies, but that is all we can do, all we ought to do, all that is practicable to do. If that is the case, there is one simple way in which this House can decide it—not leave the proposition to the Executive branch of the Government, not leave the proposition to a Navy or Army officer that gets to the head of a board to-day and next year has passed on and another has succeeded him with a different line of thought. If this House has made up its mind that it is going to fortify the entire system of the Philippine Islands, it ought to declare that affirmatively. If it is not, it should then simply declare that it proposes to build a naval base and appoint a committee——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the practical question, then, is for this Congress to appoint a committee to investigate the question thoroughly as to where the naval base should be established, how we should establish it, and what it should cost, and then proceed to make our appropriations along that line. With that in view, I contend that every dollar of this appropriation looking to the improvement of the fortifications in the Philippine Islands at any point should be stricken out of this bill. It is not necessary; we are not threatened at this time; we have plenty of time before us to investigate the question as to a proper place to establish a naval base and to do it in the correct way, and then we will waste no money. I do not believe there is a gentleman on the floor of this House that to-day will willingly agree to a plan looking to the fortification of the entire Philippine Islands, yet this appropriation would go along that line. Evidently the House is not prepared to-day to say where a naval base shall be established. So, Mr. Chairman, I hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY], providing that none of this money shall be expended either at Manila or at Subig Bay, shall be adopted, and then, if the appropriation passes, the money will be expended at Hawaii, that we know will always be a part of the American territory, and will not be a waste of the appropriation.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the committee a few minutes. I have not anybody's guess here, but I have the evidence taken within four or five days of men employed by the Government to make an examination of the situation and to further recommend to Congress what ought to be done in reference to the proposed naval station at Subig Bay. This is not the hearing before the Committee on Appropriations, but it is evidence taken by the Naval Affairs Committee to advise it whether or not we ought to make further appropriations for Subig Bay. While the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] is thoroughly in earnest, I am going to assure him in return that I am equally in earnest, and that I do not propose to be turned into a donkey here or elsewhere. [Laughter.] The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has sat here and listened to the reports that have been submitted on three or four different occasions and has voted with other gentlemen in favor of appropriations for the beginning, for the development, and for the maintenance of a naval station at Olongapo. We have much evidence touching the desirability of this place.

We are not leaders of men, neither are we military chieftains, but we do know when there is submitted to us a sensible suggestion and we usually adopt it. These men were employed by the Government to make an investigation. One, two, three boards, having the subject especially given them, submitted to this House the advisability of making some sort of a station at Subig Bay. While the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] have their views, other gentlemen who were along upon that excursion, and who sit close to where I am now speaking, have other views upon the same subject, and my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] assents thereto.

I always ask to be advised by them on certain subjects. On the subject of banking I seek the advice of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. I am sure upon all matters affecting interstate and foreign commerce I will take the advice of the gentleman of whom I have spoken in words of praise—the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]—and upon a political situation I will cheerfully follow the lead of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. Upon matters of state I am always to be found with the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], but I am unwilling to accept the advice of the gentleman from New York upon a question involving alone the proper location of a fort for the soldier or a station for the sailor.

Mr. Chairman, I will not have time to go into the dispute very fully; only a mere rambling statement touching it. The men who were examined by the Committee on Naval Affairs within the last week were Captain Swift, who is known in the Navy as a skillful strategist; Mr. Maxson, a competent employee of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, and Lieutenant-Commander Andrews, an officer of the United States Navy. Two of these men have spent days and weeks, and the civil engineer stated he had spent almost one year at Olongapo, in the service of the Government. The hearing is an interesting one; it is No. 53, and can be found, if any gentleman has curiosity to see it, in the committee room of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. May I have three mintues more?

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may have five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, Captain Swift says:

The principal objections to Cavite are:

First. The lack of space for enlarging the station, the buildings being very much crowded together and covering substantially all the available space, with inadequate streets and very limited water-front space.

Second. The entire absence of deep water near the station.

Third. The constant encroachment of the shore upon the sea in this vicinity and the consequent shoaling of the present water front and the adjacent waters.

Fourth. The lack of secure anchorage or berthing spaces and the consequent danger to vessels during the six months when typhoons prevail.

Fifth. The lack of a safe, permanent, or satisfactory location for a floating dock, or one which can be used for a stone or graving dock.

Sixth. The insanitary conditions which prevail in and about Cavite, and lack of abundant water supply under pressure or means to obtain it.

On the other hand, this official states that the health at Subig Bay is ideal. He further states that during the last year or two there have been stationed at this point nearly 1,000 marines, and that there was no case of serious sickness among them. On the contrary, he says soldiers—this is the best of my recollection of his statement—who go to Cavite are subject to malarial influences at that point, and suffer from attacks of fever, beri beri, plague, and other diseases. Many sicken, become disabled, and some of them die. Mr. Chairman, referring to Subig Bay—of course I can not read all this statement—he states there is offered the reverse of everything at Manila. The water is deep; the climate is fine; the natural protection complete. We have 400 acres of land on which to locate this station, and toward its development we have and intend to use the buildings that the Spaniards themselves built and left—the most convincing evidence that they had seen the advantage of forsaking Manila for Subig Bay. All we propose allowing at this session is some machinery to put in these buildings. The proposition never was submitted to us that we would expend as much as $30,000,000 for a naval station here. It is within the province of the House to confine appropriations to such amount and direct them to such purposes as it sees fit.

I do not care personally what the decision may be. I have no pride in success except the one shared by us all attempting to do right, but I submit to the committee whether or not it is quite fair to the American Treasury for the Congress of the United States, after deliberate consideration, attended by much discussion, to reverse itself in deference to the judgment of gentlemen who went to see but saw not, and then fortified themselves with the opinions of Army and Navy officers whose names they decline for proper reasons to disclose?

In great haste, let me go on. Here is the statement of Captain Swift, who says in substance there is no occasion to fortify Subig Bay on the land side; that no foreign foe would dare enter the Island of Luzon until it had first destroyed the fleet at Subig Bay. Furthermore, he and his colleagues say that a fleet lying in Subig Bay would offer a perfect defense of Manila, and that no foreign fleet would enter Manila Bay with this fleet lying in Subig Bay. I believe the gentlemen whom I have quoted here, Mr. Chairman, have fully answered every word of opposition that has been offered by the gentlemen of this House, whom we care a great deal for and whose conclusions are good when they are correctly informed. I refer to the gentlemen who visited the islands last summer.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word on this subject on a line different from any already suggested. I came back from the Philippines thoroughly opposed to expending any money at Subig Bay, either in the way of fortifications or in the way of a naval base, and, at the same time, I am just as thoroughly opposed to this amendment, because it seems to me the question before us now is simply an incidental question. The main question is, Shall we have a naval station at Subig Bay? And I think that every Member of the House will agree that if we are going to have a naval station there, it must be fortified. Therefore, it seems to me, the time for us to decide this issue is when the Naval Committee bring in their bill. I hope that committee will bring in a report against Subig Bay. I believe that scheme just doubles our expenses, for it compels us to fortify both Manila and Subig Bay, and I hope the Naval Committee will report against it; and if that committee reports in favor of Subig Bay, I hope this House will overrule them, and will vote not to have the naval station at that point, but to have it behind the defenses of Manila.

At the same time, Mr. Chairman, believing that, I think we will all agree that if the House is ultimately going to decide to have a naval station at Subig Bay, it must be fortified. Now, all this bill does is to provide that fortifications may be built anywhere in the Philippines that the Secretary of War shall decide, and if the Naval Committee or if this House decides not to have a naval station at Subig Bay, we all know that the Secretary of War will not spend a dollar there. So this amendment is entirely unnecessary if we are not going to have a naval station there. If we are going to have a naval station there, we all want to fortify it, and we will all want the Secretary to have this power. So it seems to me that this amendment ought to be voted down, and that the question ought to be decided, not now, upon the Appropriation Committee's report, but upon the Naval Committee's report.

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts, who is a member of the committee, for what purpose did the Appropriations Committee bring in this appropriation? Was it to fortify the islands in general, or was it for a naval base?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It was to leave to the Secretary of War the expenditure for fortification wherever, at the end of this Congress, he thought it should be expended. If we have a naval base at Subig Bay, of course he will decide it ought to be spent there, at least some of it. If we do not have the naval base at Subig Bay, you can not have any doubt that he will decide that none of it ought to be spent at Subig Bay.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does not the gentleman think that there is no danger of our coming in conflict with any foreign enemy immediately?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. We do not know.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We could not build these improvements at once. Is not the proper thing to wait until we can determine where the naval base is to be located and then determine how much money should be spent on it?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That will be decided within two months.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does not the gentleman think that the Congress ought to decide as to how much we will spend and where we will spend the money instead of the matter being decided by the Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of War?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I am perfectly willing to leave that discretion, as we always have, to the Secretary of War.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But I understood the gentleman to say a minute ago that if the Naval Committee, which has charge of these matters, decide on Subig Bay, he thought we ought to defeat it?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words upon this proposition. The whole situation seems to me to be a case where there are too many experts, too many doctors. Now, it is very interesting, of course, to get the opinion of this man and that man and some one else, who has never seen the location which has been fixed upon by the Navy Department as to the proper place for a naval station, but it is pretty hard on the patient. Now, the gentlemen who to-day are opposed to this naval station at Subig Bay are men who went over there in the Taft party, of which I happened to be a member. They came in contact with Army officers at Manila, and they have taken largely the advice of Army officers on the subject of naval affairs. Now, I appealed to some of my colleagues on that committee to go with me one day to Olongapo to see this spot. I could not induce them. They were too busy down there in Manila. So, with one member of the Naval Committee, who, unfortunately, is not here to-day, I went not only within 5 miles, but I went on the spot; and I am the only man on the floor of this House this afternoon who has ever seen this place. [Applause.] Why, the gentleman from Ohio, who is an expert on many things—and I have followed him frequently and often in this House on matters connected with this committee and on tariff matters; but he certainly will say with me that he does not enjoy reputation as a naval expert.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FOSS. I hardly think the gentleman is in a position to say whether or not that site is a fit site for a naval station.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not placed a single word I said upon my own judgment or my own knowledge or what I saw. But I want to say to the gentleman on the matter of expert knowledge, that the gentleman has been extremely anxious to get the help of "the gentleman from Ohio" to save him and keep himself from being overslaughed by the members of his own committee.

Mr. FOSS. I do not think that is hardly appropriate to this occasion. I am not saying anything against the gentleman from Ohio. I hardly think any of these gentlemen who have not seen the site where the naval station is established are in position to pass upon the question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, if the gentleman wants to tote fair and be fair to me, I will state to him that I have the testimony here of gentlemen around me, men who were upon the scene, about one mile from the place, and in what a boatman would call in the bight of the harbor. We were first about one mile, but we were in plain view of the place. Now I wish to ask how much difference there would be between the gentleman putting his foot on the bank of the ocean and the committee standing out on the head of the Logan looking out and taking the description for the officers of the Logan in returning from the bay?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlemaa has expired.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSS. The boat with the gentleman from Ohio went in and turned around in the bay, and it was at least 5 miles from the site of the naval station. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I desire, if the gentleman will permit me, to corroborate his last statement. I was on that boat within a very few feet of the distinguished gentlemen who were all opposed to this proposition, and not one of them could see what they now assume to see. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. And what did the gentleman assume to see?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman has not assumed to see anything except the mistakes of the gentleman from Connecticut. There was not a man who was within 4 miles of it.

Mr. FOSS. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think it would be wise for those who were on the water wagon there to get to where they could see.

Mr. FOSS. I have not got anything to say further about civilian experts in this case. But you find constantly lugged in here, in every speech that has been made, about what some Army officer has said, what some Army officer has stated about it. Well, now, we have established in the Philippine Islands, if I remember rightly, more than eighty Army posts. Do you suppose in the establishment of these eighty Army posts in the Philippines that the advice of naval officers has ever been called for?

We have established a great fort at Fort McKinley, costing a million of dollars and over. Did naval officers ever advise in reference to it or were they ever called in? We have paid out, I think, in the neighborhood of $2,000,000 to establish an Army road to Benguet. Was a naval officer ever called in to consider that question? Yet on the floor of this House to-day most of the discussion upon this question has turned upon the advice of Army officers. There are more than eighty Army posts, and a great fort, called "Fort McKinley," and 14,000 soldiers and more, costing the Government many millions every year; and what has the Navy had? We had a little Spanish station down there at Cavite, where we could not get a ship up drawing over 14, 15, or 20 feet of water, and you could not get a battle ship within 2 miles of it. That is the testimony before the committee. We have taken that old Spanish station, and made a few appropriations, amounting to only a few hundred thousand dollars, year by year, and kept going on there repairing our fleet.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSS. This is the testimony before the committee. The anchorage for ships of large size is from 2 to 3 miles from the water front of the yard, and all repair work on these vessels has to be done in very much the same way that a plumber does work on a house in the country when he lives in the town. But we have gone along without appropriating any money for the Navy in this way. Two years ago, looking toward the future, looking toward the establishment some time of a permanent naval base in the Philippines, Secretary Moody came before our committee and presented the report of naval officers who have gone all around those islands, sailed into all the bays and harbors, past the island of old Batan, if you please, who have gone everywhere and investigated this whole question, and who then came before the committee and said Subig Bay was the place.

Now, will you take the advice of Army officers, will you take the advice of civilian experts who have never seen the place, or will you take the advice of naval officers? If you have no confidence in your naval officers, why do you not put the Navy Department where it was originally, back into the War Department as a bureau of that Department? That is the whole question. The report of the naval officers on the site was absolutely unanimous. Then the joint board of Army and Navy officers upon this question were unanimous in their report.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the gentleman if before his time expires he will read the letter from Admiral Dewey which he referred to a while ago?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; I am going to read the letter. Somebody has tried to scatter around through the Halls the idea that Admiral Dewey never went into Subig Bay; and without any solicitation upon my part, Admiral Dewey, reading the RECORD of yesterday, wrote me this letter which I have, and I propose to have it read in a few moments.

But, gentlemen, I want to say to you that this thing has been established: Two years ago the Congress of the United States, with the hearings before it, with the report of the naval board before it, with the report of the Army and Navy Board before it, appropriated $800,000 for Olongapo. Now, there is one other thing I want to say, and that is that all of these estimates which we hear about, of forty million dollars and a hundred million dollars, and all that sort of thing, are brought in here for no other reason than just to make the proposition look ridiculous. I never heard of them until I heard them on this floor. The first proposition was a proposition between twenty and thirty million dollars, and the last proposition was a proposition brought before our committee by Mr. Secretary Moody, when he was Secretary of the Navy, for $9,000,000, extending over a long period of years. These statements can be verified by referring to the tetimony.

Now, I believe that we can get along with a station over there for a great deal less than $9,000,000, and so far as I am concerned I shall stand as a rock against any large appropriations for Olongapo. [Applause.] All we are doing this year is simply to provide for a pier and some tools. If there is one gentleman upon this floor who can find a suitable place in Manila Harbor where we can moor the floating dry dock that we are sending over there I should be glad to know it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have an hour, or such time as he desires.

Mr. FOSS. I do not want any such time as that.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am anxious to get to a vote on this proposition. I am willing that the gentleman have five minutes, but I want to close the debate as soon as I can.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSS. Our naval officers say there is no place in Manila Bay where we can moor this dock. It is a great dock; it cost $1,250,000. We need it over there, because we have to dock our ships over at Hongkong now. And in connection with that dock we need a repair station for temporary repairs. We are not going to have any general overhauling of ships or anything of that sort there.

Our proposition is to bring them back home, to our own people, and do the work in our own yards; but we must have a place to put this dock. You can not find any place to-day in Manila Bay to put it. You can not find sufficient depth of water, and if you could find sufficient depth of water, with the great mouth of Manila Bay, about 8 miles wide, I think, where the storms come in and the typhoons and the monsoons, it is the opinion of naval officers that you can not moor that dock there and have it stable. And yet gentlemen come up here without having looked into the situation at all, take the advice of Army officers and throw in their own advice, and try to discountenance the whole Navy Department upon this proposition.

Why, sir, the Navy Department might have gone down there and selected Cavite. It is near the city of Manila, where all the society is; but instead of that they went 40 miles up to Subig, where there was no city, no Newport, no Manila, near a little town called Olongapo, with only 1,200 people living there, and selected their naval station. Why? Because it was the best place for strategic purposes. There wasn't any coal mine attached to it. It is ridiculous to talk about attaching a naval station to a coal mine. Somebody will find some time an iron mine, and then they will want to drag off the naval station and attach it to that iron mine. By and by they will find a cornfield and want to drag off the naval station and attach it to the cornfield. Why? Because we use cellulose in our ships. Such a proposition as that is ludicrous and ridiculous.

A naval station has been established at this point on strategic grounds and for naval considerations which we as civilians can not understand and appreciate as well as they do. Now, Mr. Chairman, I call for the reading of the letter which I received from Admiral Dewey.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE ADMIRAL OF THE NAVY,
Washington, February 14, 1906.

MY DEAR MR. FOSS: Referring to the remarks of yourself and others in the House yesterday relative to my having visited Subig Bay, may I say that I did not go there before the battle of Manila Bay, but at that time sent part of my squadron to make a reconnoissance in search of the Spanish fleet, which I expected to find at Subig. Sometime after the battle, when we had taken possession of Cavite, I found the records of a Spanish commission which had looked into the merits of Subig Bay as a site for a naval base, upon the report of which commission the Spanish authorities were building a dry dock and doing considerable other work at Subig, with a view to abolishing the station at Cavite. I thereupon went to Subig Bay and spent considerable time in examining it, particularly as to its fitness for a naval base, and came to the conclusion, which has been strengthened by all my subsequent study, that Olongapo was an ideal natural site for a naval station and immeasurably superior to any location in Manila Bay.

Very truly, yours,

GEORGE DEWEY.

Hon. GEORGE E. FOSS,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, this debate, dragging its weary way along, has demonstrated but one thing to my mind, and that is the thorough incapacity of this body to determine a question as to where a naval station and land fortifications in continental or insular United States should be placed. We have here conflicting testimony of distinguished and capable civilians who have endeavored as best they could to investigate this subject. We have innumerable and unnamed Army officers quoted here. We have named naval officers quoted here directly in conflict with them in their testimony. Is this House a proper place in which to settle and determine the question of the location of a naval station and of seacoast fortifications thousands of miles away?

The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has seen fit to criticise the temper in which I addressed this committee. If I have displayed aught of anger I regret it. I have endeavored to preserve upon this floor that placid manner which always characterizes my distinguished friend from Ohio. [Laughter.] And in so far as I have failed to equal his high standard I regret it. The truth is that the gentleman from Ohio, and other gentlemen who went out there, studied this question at long range, and they came away with conflicting testimony to bear witness before this committee. It is an utterly impracticable thing for the Congress of the United States to pass upon such questions. This bill does not appropriate a dime for Subig Bay. This bill provides for $600,000 for the insular possessions in the Philippines and Hawaiian Islands. It is for the War Department and the Navy Department to say where the emergency requires that expenditure.

It has been asserted by the distinguished leader of this side of the House that Army officers told him that this is a mistaken locality for a station at Subig Bay. If the Army officers agree in that belief, not one penny of this appropriation will be assigned to Subig Bay; not one penny of this money can be assigned to Subig Bay unless the War Department says that that is where it ought to go as against Manila and as against Honolulu.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to ask this question. The gentleman's committee has investigated this question for the benefit of the House?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. We have done the best we could.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If your committee does not know where the money is to be expended, how does the committee know that it ought to be expended?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will answer the gentleman's question: Because this House has appropriated in bills of this character $119,000,000 in the last eighteen years, without designating where one penny of it was to be expended and without any knowledge upon that subject, but was content to be governed by the advice of those experts that we turned out at West Point and Annapolis, the best in the world, and not set up civilian judgment against them. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that where we have appropriated money in this way these experts have come before the committee and testified why they wanted the money and where they wanted it?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will say that they have never testified as fully on any appropriation for continental United States as they have to these appropriations for the insular possessions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending amendment and paragraph be closed in five minutes to enable the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], the author of the amendment, to close debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that all debate on the paragraph and the amendment be closed in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there are two amendments pending before the House—one offered by myself to prevent the expenditure of any of this money at Subig Bay, the other offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] to prevent any of it being expended at Manila. I would be glad to have that amendment adopted if I did not know that it would prevent the adoption of the amendment offered by myself. There has been sufficient conflict of opinion in this House to-day to show that it is not yet well settled that there should be a naval station at Olongapo. At this time it will not be settled whether a naval station shall be there or not. The only thing desired is to prevent the allotment of money there. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] states that if the Army officers believe this money should not be expended there it will not be expended there. That statement is not quite fair, because the Army officers say that unless a naval station is placed there they will not spend a dollar, but that if a naval station is placed there they will be compelled to defend the place. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] has scoffed at the Army officers, yet he took great delight yesterday in calling them as witnesses in those cases in which they had testified on the side which he is favoring. It is the officers of the Army who chiefly plan and determine upon the land fortifications at all these places.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to interrupt the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; for a question.

Mr. FOSS. The gentleman has entirely misstated what I said. I am not scoffing at the Army officers. I am saying they are not, in my judgment, competent to decide on naval questions.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the Army officers do determine whether these places can be fortified and how they shall be fortified. We may not be able to determine in this House whether one place or another is best fitted for a naval base, but we can determine intelligently and without much difficulty whether we shall authorize the establishment of a naval base at all, which will cost from $30,000,000 up; according to the gentleman on that side of the House, $100,000,000. We may not get a place that may be quite so ideal, but we can get a place that, in my opinion, will be just as good, will serve the purpose just as well, and can be obtained at a much more reasonable expenditure of money. The only purpose of my amendment at this time is to prevent further money being allotted for fortifications at a place where the chief of the engineering department stated only within two weeks there was nothing but vacant land. These defenses will become imperative upon the erection of a naval station, and this amendment, if adopted, will be notice to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] and his colleagues on the Committee on Naval Affairs that if they have any intention of recommending an extravagant plan for a naval station at Olongapo this House will quickly condemn it, as it should be condemned.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RIXEY) there were—ayes 47, noes 104.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 65, noes 119.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition for seacoast cannon, for the insular possessions, including the necessary experiments in connection therewith, and the machinery necessary for its manufacture at the arsenals, $100,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, strike out lines 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this item provides $100,000 for reserve ammunition for seacoast guns in the insular possessions. Last year there was appropriated $100,000 for this purpose. There is a Treasury balance of over $90,000 in this account. Not a single gun has been mounted in the insular possessions to-day, although $100,000 has been expended for reserve ammunition. At a proper time additional appropriations for this purpose will undoubtedly be necessary, but it does not seem to be wise or advisable to continue to appropriate money for reserve ammunition when there is not a single gun mounted for which this ammunition is purchased or could be used. It is not a matter of great importance, but it seems unwise to continue to appropriate for reserve ammunition when the guns are not yet in position; and if the money were made available now and the ammunition purchased there would be no guns in which to use the ammunition.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to say but a word. We have given $100,000 where we were asked to give $276,000 for this purpose. Many of these guns will be mounted by June, and this will only provide a small fraction of the ordinary reserve ammunition provided for the artillery.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase, manufacture, and test of inspecting instruments for the manufacture of cannon, carriages, and ammunition; range finders and other instruments for fire control at the fortifications in the insular possessions, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture at the arsenals, $32,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I will not take up the time of the committee to read certain statements I have here, but I desire unanimous consent to place in the RECORD, as part of my remarks, certain utterances of William J. Bryan expressing his reasons why he supported the ratification of the Paris treaty, by which we acquired the Philippine Islands. His position has been discussed pro and con.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. What is it the gentleman wants?

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman. This morning there was great colloquy as to why Mr. Bryan favored the ratification of the treaty whereby we acquired the Philippine Islands, and——

Mr. PAYNE. If that is what it is, I have no objection. I think it ought to be published.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[The Commoner Condensed, page 144. By William J. Bryan.]

THE RATIFICATION OF THE TREATY.

A reader of the Commoner has called attention to the fact that Republicans try to shirk responsibility for an imperial policy by saying that I advised the ratification of the treaty. He asks that I state the reasons which led me to favor ratification.

In a speech delivered at Indianapolis, August 8, 1900, accepting the Democratic nomination, I took occasion to discuss this matter, the following being an extract from that speech:

"When the President finally laid before the Senate a treaty which recognized the independence of Cuba, but provided for the cession of the Philippine Islands to the United States, the menace of imperialism became so apparent that many preferred to reject the treaty and risk the ills that might follow rather than take the chance of correcting the errors of the treaty by the independent action of this country.

"I was among the number of those who believed it better to ratify the treaty and end the war, release the volunteers, remove the excuse for war expenditures, and then give the Filipinos the independence which might be forced from Spain by a new treaty.

"In view of the criticism which my action aroused in some quarters, I take this occasion to restate the reasons given at that time. I thought it safer to trust the American people to give independence to the Filipinos than to trust the accomplishment of that purpose in diplomacy with an unfriendly nation.

"Lincoln embodied an argument in the question when he asked, 'Can aliens make treaties easier than friends can make laws?' I believe that we are now in a better position to wage a successful contest against imperialism than we would have been had the treaty been rejected. With the treaty ratified a clean-cut issue is presented between a government by consent and a government by force, and imperialists must bear the responsibility for all that happens until the question is settled.

"If the treaty had been rejected the opponents of imperialism would have been held responsible for any international complications which might have arisen before the ratification of another treaty. But whatever difference of opinion may have existed as to the best method of opposing a colonial policy, there never was any difference as to the great importance of the question and there is no difference now as to the course to be pursued.

"The title of Spain being extinguished, we were at liberty to deal with the Filipinos according to American principles. The Bacon resolution, introduced a month before hostilities broke out at Manila, promised independence to the Filipinos on the same terms that it was promised to the Cubans. I supported this resolution and believe that its adoption prior to the breaking out of hostilities would have prevented bloodshed, and that its adoption at any subsequent time would have ended hostilities.

"If the treaty had been rejected considerable time would have necessarily elapsed before a new treaty could have been agreed upon and ratified, and during that time the question would have been agitating the public mind. If the Bacon resolution had been adopted by the Senate and carried out by the President, either at the time of the ratification of the treaty or at any time afterwards, it would have taken the question of imperialism out of politics and left the American people free to deal with their domestic problems. But the resolution was defeated by the vote of the Republican Vice-President, and from that time to this a Republican Congress has refused to take any action whatever in the matter."

While the treaty was pending in the Senate, and about two months before the vote was taken upon it, I wrote an article for the New York Journal, giving reasons in support of the proposition to ratify the treaty and declare the policy of the Government by resolution. This article will be found on another page of this issue.

The ratification of the treaty in no way committed this nation to an imperial policy. It simply terminated Spanish authority and left the United States free to deal with the islands according to American principles. The Bacon resolution, which declared it to be the purpose of the United States to establish a stable government, which, when established, was to be turned over to the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, was a tie vote in the Senate, and was only defeated by the vote of the Vice-President. As the treaty required a two-thirds vote for its ratification, it is evident that one-fourth of those who voted to ratify did so with the understanding that the question remained an open one.

Senator Wellington, of Maryland, voted for the ratification of the treaty, and in a speech delivered last fall he stated that he so voted because the President promised him that the Philippine Islands would not be held permanently. If the ratification of the treaty had necessarily committed this country to an imperialistic policy, then all who opposed imperialism would have been justified in opposing it, aye, even compelled to oppose the treaty. But as ratification did not commit the nation to an imperialistic policy, the only question the Senate had to consider was how best to correct the errors in the treaty.

The payment of $20,000,000 to Spain did not obligate this country to enter upon a colonial policy. It could have been recovered from the Filipinos in return for independence, and if not recovered, it was a small contribution to the extension of liberty. We had by one act of Congress appropriated $50,000,000 to secure independence for the Cubans, who numbered less than 2,000,000, could we not spare two-fifths of the sum to bring liberty to five times as many in the Philippines?

The treaty should have provided for the independence of the Filipinos as it provided for the independence of the Cubans, but when the treaty, by an inexcusable error, provided for cession instead of independence it was easier to ratify the treaty, extinguish the title of Spain, and confer independence upon the Filipinos than to continue the war and risk international complications by an effort to compel Spain to do what we could do ourselves.

Our treaty with Spain, according to international law, imposed upon us no obligations to change our form of government or to abandon our ideals in order to enforce an imperialistic doctrine. It is still possible for this nation to return to American methods. All it has to do is to announce its purpose to deal with the Filipinos in accordance with the principles set forth in the Declaration of Independence and then keep its promise. Why does it not do this? Because the Republicans think that oriental trade is more important than American principles.

[The Commoner, page 434. By William J. Bryan.]

RATIFY THE TREATY—DECLARE THE NATION'S POLICY.

I gladly avail myself of the columns of the Journal to suggest a few reasons why the opponents of a colonial policy should make their fight in support of a resolution declaring the nation's purpose rather than against the ratification of the treaty.

The conflict between the doctrine of self-government and the doctrine of alien government supported by external force has been thrust upon the American people as a result of the war. It is so important a conflict that it can not be avoided, and, since it deals with a question now before Congress, it must be considered immediately. It is useless to ask what effect this new issue will have upon other issues. Issues must be met as they arise; they can not be moved about at will like pawns upon a chess board.

The opponents of imperialism have an opportunity to choose the ground upon which the battle is to be fought. Why not oppose the ratification of the treaty?

First. Because a victory won against the treaty should prove only temporary if the people really favor a colonial policy.

That a victory won against the treaty would depend for its value entirely upon the sentiment of the people is evident. A minority can obstruct action for a time, but a minority, so long as it remains a minority, can only delay action and enforce reflection, it can not commit the nation to a policy.

When there seemed some probability of the rejection of the treaty, the friends of the Administration began to suggest the propriety of withholding the treaty until the new Senate could be convened in extra session. As the new Senate will have a considerable Republican majority it would be quite certain to ratify the treaty. Thus an effort to prevent the ratification of the treaty would be likely to fail in the very beginning. But let us suppose it possible to defeat ratification in both the present and the next Senate—what will be the result? Would the imperialist abandon the hope of annexing the Philippines so long as they can claim the support of the President and a majority of both Houses? Could a minority of the Senate prevent the annexation of Hawaii? As we are now in possession of the Philippine Islands, the advocates of a colonial policy might secure an appropriation sufficient to pay the twenty millions agreed upon and leave the rest to the treaty for future consideration. In other words, if the opponents of the imperialists have a majority they can declare the nation's policy; if the imperialists have a majority in both Houses, they can not be permanently thwarted by a minority in the Senate.

A resolution declaring the nation's policy recognizes that the destiny of the United States is in the hands of all the people and seeks to ascertain at once the sentiment of the people as reflected by their representatives.

If that decision is in harmony with the policy which has prevailed in the past, the question will be settled, and the people will return to the consideration of domestic problems. If, however, the advocates of imperialism either postpone consideration or control the action of Congress, an appeal will be taken to the voters at the next election. So great a change in our national policy can not be made unless the authority therefor comes directly and unequivocally from that source of all power in a republic—the people.

In answer to those who fear the question of imperialism, if discussed, will draw attention away from other questions, it is sufficient to say that the people can not be prevented from considering a question which reaches down to the foundation principles of the Republic. Instead of avoiding the issue, it is the part of wisdom to deal with it at once and dispose of it permanently.

Second. The rejection of the treaty would be unwise, because the opponents of the treaty would be compelled to assume responsibility for the continuance of war conditions and for the risks which always attend negotiations with a hostile nation.

The rejection of the treaty would give the Administration an excuse for military expenditures which could not be justified after the conclusion of peace, and the opponents of the treaty would be charged with making such appropriations necessary. It must be remembered that in case the treaty is rejected negotiations must be renewed with an enemy whose ill-will is not concealed. Who is able to guarantee the nation against new dangers and new complications? In order to form an estimate of the risks which would thus be incurred, one has only to recall the unexpected things which have happened since war was declared. Is it wise to make the attack and to assume all the risks when the same end can be gained by a plan which throws the risks upon our opponents? If the imperialists vote down a resolution declaring the nation's policy or postpone its consideration, they become responsible for any loss of life or expenditure of money which may follow as a result of such action.

I suggest below a few reasons in support of a resolution declaring it to be the nation's purpose to establish a stable government in Cuba and the Philippines and then to give the inhabitants independence under an American protectorate, which will guard them against molestation from without.

First. Such a course is consistent with national honor.

Our nation owes it to the nations with which we have dealings, as well as to the inhabitants of Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines, to announce immediately what it intends to do respecting the territory surrendered by Spain.

The President has said that the only purpose our nation has in taking possession of Cuba is to assist the inhabitants to establish a stable and independent government. It can do no harm for Congress to reaffirm this purpose, and it may do much good. The Cubans, having fought for independence for many years and against great odds, are naturally jealous of the liberty which they have won, and no doubt should be left as to the sincerity and good faith of our Government in its dealings with them. Such a declaration would not only be harmless, but it is almost made necessary by the flippant, if not contemptuous, tone in which some United States officials speak of the intelligence and patriotism of the Cubans and of their right to independence.

The duty of declaring our national policy in regard to the Philippines is even more imperative. The Filipinos were fighting for independence when the United States declared war against Spain. In the formal protest filed with the peace commissioners in Paris the representatives of Aguinaldo assert that they received friendly assurances from United States officials and acted upon those assurances in cooperating against the Spaniards. Whether or not such assurances were given, frankness and honesty should characterize our dealings with them.

If we announce to the world that we hold the Philippine Islands, not for pecuniary profit, but in trust for the inhabitants; if we declare that our only purpose is to assist the Filipinos to establish a stable and independent government, friendly relations will be maintained and there will be little need of troops. If, on the other hand, the Filipinos are not to have independence but merely a change of masters, we should break the news to them at once and send over a large army to instruct them in the principles of a government which in one hemisphere derives its just powers from the consent of the governed and in the other derives its authority from superior force.

While our nation is not prepared to draft a complete code of laws suited to the peculiar needs of the Filipinos, we ought to be able to decide at once whether we intend to deal with them according to the principles of our own Government or according to the customs prevailing among the European monarchies. Even a Republican Congress ought to be able to choose without hesitation between a policy which establishes a republic in the Orient and a policy which sows the seeds of militarism in the United States.

The trade relations possible under a protectorate would be of more value to the United States than any which could come as result of forcible annexation.

The people of Porto Rico have not manifested any desire for political independence and would, in all probability, favor annexation, yet it is only right that they should have an opportunity to choose. The resolution authorizing intervention recognized the right of the Cubans to independence. To be consistent we must also respect the wishes of the inhabitants of Porto Rico. The resolution could without impropriety offer annexation to Porto Rico.

In a recent interview I suggested that the United States should retain a harbor and coaling station in the Philippines and in Porto Rico in return for services rendered, and added that Cuba should be asked to make a similar concession on the same ground.

Second. A resolution declaring the nation's purpose presents a plain and clear-cut issue between the theory of self-government and the colonial policy. It presents a positive, affirmative method of dealing with the question. In opposing the treaty we would be on the defensive; in outlining a policy we shall be aggressive. The strongest arguments which could be used in support of the treaty will lose their force entirely when Spain is eliminated and the American people are able to dispose of the question according to their own ideas and interests.

Third. It secures by easier means every end that can be secured by a rejection of the treaty.

If an officer of the law arrests a person in possession of stolen goods, he can either compel the return of the goods to the owner or he can first rescue them and then return them himself. We find Spain in the possession of a title to a part of the Philippines. She has not yet conquered all the native tribes, but the title which she has was acquired by force and has been held by force. We can either compel her to surrender her title to the Filipinos, as we compelled her to surrender Cuba to the Cubans, or we can accept possession and then of our own accord turn over the islands to the inhabitants. The peace commissioners might have demanded independence for the Filipinos, as they did for the Cubans. If they did not properly interpret the wishes of the people of the United States the blame must fall upon them and not upon the people. Certainly 70,000,000 of citizens are under no obligations to abate their devotion to the ideals which they have cherished for a century in order to indorse the work of a peace commission or to approve of the instructions of an executive.

It is urged that the ratification of the treaty imposes upon us an obligation to pay $20,000,000 to Spain. I answered, first, that this amount can probably be secured from the Filipinos in return for independence, and, second, that, if it can not be secured from them, it is better to lose the amount entirely than to expend a larger sum in securing a modification of the treaty.

It is better to regard the amount paid as a contribution to liberty than to consider it the market price of land, improvements, or people.

To terminate the war upon the same high plane upon which it was inaugurated is worthy of a great Republic; to descend from a sublime beginning to the purchase of sovereignty—for her own profit—from a nation whose title we disputed in Cuba would lay us open to the charge of punic faith.

DEMOCRATIC DUTY.

The Democratic platform of 1900 not only presented a plan for the peaceful and permanent settlement of the Philippine question, but it presented the only complete plan that has been offered to the American people. It reads as follows:

"We condemn and denounce the Philippine policy of the present Administration. It has involved the Republic in unnecessary war, sacrificed the lives of many of our noblest sons, and placed the United States, previously known and applauded throughout the world as the champion of freedom, in the false and un-American position of crushing with military force the efforts of our former allies to achieve liberty and self-government."

"The Filipinos can not be citizens without endangering our civilization. They can not be subjects without imperiling our form of government, and as we are not willing to surrender our civilization or to convert the Republic into an empire, we favor an immediate declaration of the nation's purpose to give the Filipinos, first, a stable form of government; second, independence, and, third, protection from outside interference, such as has been given for nearly a century to the republics of Central and South America."

The Clerk read as follows:

That all material purchased under the foregoing provisions of this act shall be of American manufacture, except in cases when, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, it is to the manifest interest of the United States to make purchases in limited quantities abroad, which material shall be admitted free of duty.

Mr. WALDO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WALDO] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, after line 17, on page 10 of the bill, the following:

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that portion of the bill has been passed and the amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York was on his feet asking recognition, and the Chair was unable to find just where the Clerk was reading until too late. It is the fault of the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Then, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will continue to read.

The Clerk continued to read, as follows:

For the purchase of 45 acres of land adjoining the Government reservation at Fort Hamilton, New York Harbor, lying between Fort Hamilton avenue, Ninety-second street, and said reservation, and such other land as may lie between said reservation and Dyker Beach Park, the sum of $250,000.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that this is not authorized by existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] on his point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is very difficult for me to speak to the point of order, in view of the fact that this amount provided for in the amendment is not covered by any estimates submitted to the committee. It has never been the practice to make appropriations for sites for specific places. It is contrary to the usage of the Government, and if we make appropriations for a site at a definite place, then the price of that site will rise to the amount of the appropriation. To make this appropriation would be a violation of the entire system and practice in the building of the seacoast fortifications. There is no law authorizing this purchase, and it seems to me there ought to be some such law before this amendment would be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. WALDO. Mr. Chairman, in the first place this is work to be done for the military establishment of the Government, and there has been an estimate from the Department upon this very item. On page 237 of the Book of Estimates, the first item is:

Additional land, Fort Hamilton, New York Harbor: For the purchase of about 45 acres of land adjoining Fort Hamilton, New York Harbor, required upon which to begin the reconstruction of that post, $250,000.

NOTE: The present accommodations are wholly inadequate for the present garrison, and the quarters, barracks, stables, and storehouses should be replaced by more suitable and modern buildings, and the land available for building sites and drill grounds is not sufficient to lay out a post to properly meet the demands of the case.—C. F. Humphrey, Quartermaster-General, United States Army.

This is the recommendation of the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The Quartermaster-General is not authorized to submit estimates to this committee; and there were no estimates anyway.

Mr. WALDO. It is an estimate from the War Department and not from the Quartermaster-General.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think the matter of the estimates is important. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to the fact that this land is land adjoining a Government reservation. Now, the Chair understands that it has been repeatedly held that the purchase of such adjoining land is a continuance of a public work or object already in progress. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendment to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CURRIER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 14171, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass:

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question upon the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REENGROSSMENT OF CERTAIN BILLS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the Clerk be directed to have reengrossed and properly attested the following bills:

H. R. 7085. Authorizing the Pea River Power Company to erect a dam in Coffee County, Ala.;

H. R. 11263. To authorize the construction of a bridge across the navigable waters of St. Andrews Bay; and

H. R. 11045. To amend an act entitled "An act to authorize Washington and Westmoreland counties, in the State of Pennsylvania, to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River, in the State of Pennsylvania," approved February 21, 1903.

Ordered further, That the Clerk be directed to request the Senate to have made on the engrossed copies of each of the said bills the proper indorsement of the Senate's action thereon.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, just a word in explanation. I am told that these three engrossed bills were sent by the House to the Senate, and somehow or other, coming from the Senate to the House, these engrossed bills have been lost. The bills passed the House and passed the Senate, and this resolution simply contemplates that new enrolled bills shall be made, the Speaker sign them, and send them to the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the order.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Reserving the right to object, this is not a privileged resolution.

Mr. PAYNE. It is a privileged resolution.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I ask if this takes in the bill that has been returned from the President?

Mr. PAYNE. It does not. It is another dam bill.

The question was taken, and the order was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the order was agreed to was laid on the table.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS FROM THE FILES.

Mr. PATTERSON of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Benjamin Kellar, Fifty-ninth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of James Drewry, Fifty-ninth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

The bill (S. 1864) for the relief of James H. Oliver, a commander on the retired list of the United States Navy, was announced as first in order on the Calendar, and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments, in line 6, after the word "Navy," to strike out the words "to take rank at the foot of said grade next after Commander Frank M. Bostwick;" and in line 11, after the word "grade," to add the following proviso:

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposes to strike out the preamble.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the preamble will be stricken out.

BRIDGES OVER ST. FRANCIS RIVER, ARKANSAS.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of two bridge bills, reported this morning from the Committee on Commerce. They are House bills and it is necessary that they should receive early consideration in order that the work may be commenced.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be read.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 13567) to authorize the Campbell Lumber Company to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River in Clay County, Ark., at or near the point where the section line between sections 21 and 28, township 19 north, range 9 east, touches said river; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13568) to authorize the Campbell Lumber Company to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River in Clay County, Ark., at or near the point where the section line between sections 23 and 26, in township 20 north, range 9 east, touches said river.

Mr. LODGE. I shall not object to this bill, but after it is disposed of I shall ask for the regular order. I think we ought to take up the bills in their order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNLAWFUL WEARING OF MILITARY BADGES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the Calendar.

The bill (H. R. 58) to prevent the unlawful wearing of the badge or insignia of the Grand Army of the Republic or other soldier organizations was announced as next in order on the Calendar; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, on page 1, line 8, after the words "Spanish War Veterans," to insert "or the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution," and that amendment has heretofore been agreed to.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I am not disposed to object to bills of any kind generally, but I can not understand why the Congress of the United States shall legislate to protect the badges of associations that do not belong to the public service in any way. I do not see what Congress has to do with these things. If we are going into such business as that, there will be no end to it, and I shall object to its consideration if there is any unanimous consent about it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over under the objection of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. SCOTT. What Senator objected to the consideration of the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY].

Mr. SCOTT. I understood the Senator to say that he did not object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Did the Chair understand the Senator from Mississippi to object to the present consideration of the bill just read?

Mr. MONEY. I do, until I can look into it a little bit.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over under objection.

Mr. MONEY. I see no reason why it should be made the subject of an enactment by Congress.

IMPORTATION OF IMPURE AND UNWHOLESOME TEA.

Mr. STONE. I desire to call up the bill (S. 1548) to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the importation of impure and unwholesome tea," approved March 2, 1897.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. STONE. I offer the following amendment.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator permit me? After a brief explanation from the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT], I withdraw the objection I made a few moments ago and ask the Senator to permit the bill in regard to the unlawful wearing of badges to be taken up in its order and considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the words "United States," page 2 of the bill, insert a comma and the words "to be approved as to amount and sureties by the Secretary of the Treasury;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of "An act to prevent the importation of impure and unwholesome tea," approved March 2, 1897, be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words: "Provided, That nothing herein shall affect or prevent the importation into the United States of any merchandise as tea, tea waste, tea siftings, or tea sweepings for the sole purpose of manufacturing theine, caffeine, or other chemical products whereby the identity and character of the original material is entirely destroyed or changed; and that importers and manufacturers who import or bring into the United States such tea, tea waste, tea siftings, or tea sweepings shall give suitable bond to the United States, to be approved as to amount and sureties by the Secretary of the Treasury, that said imported material shall be only so used under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. STONE. I have offered that amendment to meet the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, we have had no explanation of the bill from the Senator in charge of it. Is there any written report with it?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A report accompanies the bill.

Mr. STONE. There is a report.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator explain it?

Mr. STONE. I can do so.

Mr. President, I think as intelligent and concise an explanation as I could make of the bill can be made by reading a part of a letter I have received from an important manufacturing establishment in St. Louis, and at whose instance, I will say, the bill was introduced. The letter is from the Monsanto Chemical Works, manufacturers of modern chemical products, of St. Louis. The president of that company or concern writes to me as follows:

We have undertaken the manufacture of a chemical product known as "caffeine" (or "theine"), which at the present time is produced entirely from tea waste, siftings, and sweepings. This material is the tailings or the refuse (waste) collected in the various tea houses and gardens of the world. It is composed of tea fluff, taken off the leaves; siftings, which occur in sorting out the tea, and the sweepings or dust which accumulates in the various tea warehouses.

This material was always thrown away up to the time caffeine became an important chemical product, when, on analysis, it was found that this tea refuse contained an appreciable amount of caffeine alkaloid, since which time it has been saved and sold to the various manufacturers and producers of caffeine.

Caffeine has become a very important chemical product, and up to a comparatively few years has been manufactured entirely in Germany and England.

I will say at this point that I am informed there is but one other company, besides the company of which the author of this letter is the president, manufacturing caffeine, and that is located in New Jersey.

The German manufacturers are allowed to import this tea waste ad libitum, whereas the English manufacturers are also allowed to import this quality of goods, but under supervision of the Government, who see that it actually enters into the manufacture of caffeine, so that there is no possibility of this quality of goods interfering with their tea laws.

Now, as against these conditions, the American manufacturer of caffeine is compelled to denature the tea waste before importing by adding 10 per cent of lime—for the purpose of making it unfit for food purposes—when it is allowed to enter into the United States as "crude drugs." The cost of the lime and the labor for this process at point of shipment is about 20 per cent of the cost of the goods, to which also must be added the additional heavy freight charges caused by the addition of this lime, making the actual cost to the American manufacturer almost 25 per cent more than the European manufacturers pay for the same goods at their factories.

While we have a protective duty of 25 per cent ad valorem on caffeine, it must not be overlooked that the yield of caffeine from this tea waste is about 2½ per cent. To be more explicit, say 100 pounds of tea waste yields 2½ pounds caffeine. The duty on this product is 25 per cent ad valorem, as against which must be considered that foreign manufacturers have cheap labor and pay freight to the United States on only 2½ pounds of goods, while we are compelled to pay freight charges on 110 pounds (100 pounds tea waste and 10 pounds lime), and about 25 per cent more for the same raw material, on account of the expense incurred in denaturing it by the addition of lime before it is allowed entry to the United States.

Under these conditions you can readily see that we are justified in asking for relief from this last great unnecessary expense to be in position to compete with the European manufacturers. And, furthermore, as such outlay is paid to foreign labor by American manufacturers, while no one in this country gets any benefit whatever from it.

Now, as I understand the purpose of the bill——

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. SPOONER. If this bill were enacted into law, would the tea which would thereby be imported be subject to duty?

Mr. STONE. The tea waste?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. STONE. I think it would be subject to a duty of 25 per cent.

Mr. SPOONER. That is not so now?

Mr. STONE. As to tea waste?

Mr. SPOONER. That is prohibited, is it not?

Mr. STONE. Yes; but do you mean would this product be subject to duty?

Mr. SPOONER. The bill proposes to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the importation of impure and unwholesome tea," with a proviso that this tea, which is now prohibited from being imported, shall be permitted to be imported if it be denaturized, and that it only may be used for the purpose indicated in the bill. My question is, would this——

Mr. STONE. Tea waste?

Mr. SPOONER. Would this impure tea, or the tea which this bill would permit to be brought into the United States, be subject to duty, or be brought in free of duty under this bill?

Mr. STONE. I should think it would come in free.

Mr. SPOONER. If it would be subject to duty, the bill should not originate in the Senate. That is the only point of my question.

Mr. STONE. There is no tariff upon it now, and this would not impose one. It is not attempted by the bill to do that.

Mr. SPOONER. There is a tariff on teas of every description which are permitted to be entered. If the prohibition upon the entry or importation of certain teas is repealed, whether this would be subject to duty would depend upon the phraseology of the tariff act in reference to tea. I do not know what the fact would be, and asked because I did not know but what the Senator from Missouri had looked into it.

Mr. STONE. I have not looked into that feature of it. The mere purpose of this bill is to enable the manufacturers of caffeine out of tea waste to bring the tea in in its natural form. Under the regulations prescribed by the bill it may be denaturized here, by that means very largely reducing the expense, which would be a useless expenditure now imposed upon the manufacturer in being compelled to denaturize it abroad.

The bill has the approval of the Committee on Commerce, the approval of the Treasury Department, and the approval of the Department of Agriculture.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I see the approval of this bill by the Secretary of Agriculture is somewhat guarded. He says:

I approve of the measure, provided the safeguards against the consumption of the articles imported are sufficiently explicit to secure for manufacturing purposes the whole of the imports admitted under the provisions of the proposed act.

Mr. STONE. I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the last line of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I have that before me.

Mr. STONE. That reads:

The said imported material shall be only so used under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator think such regulations would afford sufficient protection? I only want to inquire of the Senator if he has looked into this subject to such an extent as to answer that?

Mr. STONE. I suppose, under this bill, the Secretary of the Treasury could perform that duty better than anyone else.

Mr. ALLISON. I understood the Senator from Missouri to say that there was only one manufacturer of this product.

Mr. STONE. I have stated that I understand, aside from the one in St. Louis, there is but one other in the United States.

Mr. ALLISON. Possibly the bill is sufficiently guarded.

Mr. STONE. If it is not, it certainly should be, and I am willing to accept any suggestion on that line.

Mr. ALLISON. I think probably the Secretary of the Treasury can make regulations covering the matter.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish the Senator from Missouri would permit the bill to go over. It is early in the session, and the bill will not suffer at all from a little delay. I wish to look into the question as to whether this product will be dutiable or not if this bill shall be passed, whether the tea waste, now altogether prohibited from importation, would, if the bar be removed, be subject to duty under the tariff act. If it would be, it is perfectly clear that such a bill can not originate in the Senate, for it is a bill affecting the revenue. I wish for one to look a little more carefully into the proposition whether the public interest can be adequately safeguarded by regulations operative upon the subject-matter after it shall have been admitted into this country and shall have reached its destination in St. Louis, or wherever else the manufacturing establishments may be located.

The act which it is proposed to amend by this bill is an act passed by Congress in the interest of the public health; it is framed, I see, with very great care, and it deals with a subject which peculiarly justifies legislative attention. I do not see what the Secretary of Agriculture particularly has to do with it; why he has to approve it, though I know it is getting to be so now that almost everything has to be approved directly or indirectly by the Secretary of Agriculture which has any relation whatever to drugs or food.

Mr. ALLISON. Or health.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator says "health," but even that does not constitute the limit. As stated by the Senator from Iowa, the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture is entirely conditional; he does not—and he is wise in that—commit himself to the proposition that adequate safeguards can be afforded. The acting Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Taylor—and the Treasury Department is the Department which is to make these regulations—writes a letter which is not, for its strength and directness, particularly persuasive to me. Acknowledging the receipt of the reference and setting forth a copy of the bill, the Secretary says:

> The matter has been carefully considered and advice received from the board of tea experts at New York, appointed under the provisions of section 2 of the tea act of March 2, 1897.

That is the act to prevent the importation of impure and unwholesome tea. The Acting Secretary further says:

> The majority of the board—

That is this board of tea experts appointed by the Government and paid by the Government, doubtless because of their known ability and integrity to perform faithfully this duty of inspection and judgment—

> The majority of the board are not in favor of the proposed legislation.

They can have no interest in it but the public interest. It is impossible to conceive of any basis for their opposition to it except their judgment as experts, that it is impracticable for the Secretary of the Treasury to frame regulations which will safeguard, as it is now safeguarded, the public against the surreptitious use of tea waste and the like, after it has been admitted and has reached the manufacturing establishments, which are simply under bond.

> The minority is of the opinion that the intent and purpose of the tea act can be fully safeguarded under the proposed bill by proper departmental regulations, and I concur in this opinion.

That is the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, who is not an expert on the subject at all and does not profess to be, concurs in the opinion of the minority of the tea experts against the opinion of the majority of the tea experts that this ought not to be admitted.

There is one thing very certain, Mr. President. The present law protects the people of the United States, the consumers of tea of every class and grade, and every age and sex, against this impure and unfit article which Congress, in the interest of the public health, has excluded from the United States; and it protects it, because at tide water it subjects all tea to examination. If the experts discover any of the prohibited tea, it is excluded, it is not permitted to be taken from the custom-houses at all, or to get in any way whatever into the commerce of the country to be made into drink. That is safe; the majority of the experts say the other is not safe; and I think, for the sake of the dealers and the manufacturers, it is a subject upon which legislation should be on the safe side in the protection of health.

On further examination, I do not know but it may be discovered that this bill may safely pass; but for one I want to see the communications from the board of experts; I want to know on what ground the majority put their opinion against it, and I want to know the terms of the opinion of the minority which favors it. And so—I suppose an objection will stop this bill for the time being—without prejudice to the bill, Mr. President, I ask that it go over.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will lie over.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course I withdraw the objection if the Senator from Missouri desires to be heard.

Mr. STONE. Just a word, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I certainly would not myself object, if I could, to the bill going over as has been requested; but I hope to have it again considered at a very early day, and trust that it may then be disposed of in some way.

Mr. President, it goes without saying that none of us desires to have introduced impure products that may be used for food which will in any degree imperil the public health. Caffeine, however, is an important chemical product used in a great many chemical combinations, and if it can be manufactured here and give employment to capital and to labor, and a new industry thereby be developed, it ought to be done. I think there will be universal concurrence in that statement.

The waste tea, out of which the caffeine is produced, ought to be admitted under the terms of this bill or along the lines proposed by this bill as cheaply as possible to the manufacturers, if it can be done without danger to the public health. I understand that to be the point which the Senator suggested, aside from the one involving the tariff feature of it.

Now, Mr. President, it does seem to me that the Secretary of the Treasury ought to be able to prescribe regulations that would guard the misuse of this article when it is once imported.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to ask the Senator whether or not this refuse tea can be put to any other use than the manufacture of caffeine?

Mr. STONE. It can not. After it has been denatured its whole utility as tea is lost.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It can not be used, then, in any form of food, and can only be used as a product from which to manufacture caffeine?

Mr. SPOONER. That is not true.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I want to know what the truth is.

Mr. SPOONER. Under the law now, before it can come into this country at all, it is denatured, as the Senator from Missouri says, after which operation it can not be used for food purposes. The proposed change in the law is to permit it coming into this country before it is denatured, and be denatured under bond wherever the consignee happens to live.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And so it could be used for other purposes than the manufacture of caffeine? That is the point in which I am interested.

Mr. STONE. It can be denatured under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. The article of waste tea is denatured, as they term it, by the use of lime. It is mixed with lime, and after the chemical operation of the lime is completed its food quality is absolutely destroyed, as I understand.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator be kind enough to say what is the matter of cost in denaturing it that leads these manufacturers to desire its admission and this operation of denaturing to take place in this country? What is the reason they are dissatisfied with the present law?

Mr. STONE. It must be denatured abroad now.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. And it requires the shipment of 110 pounds of waste tea and lime, paid for as freight, while the competing manufacturer in England and Germany takes 100 pounds of waste tea and converts it into two and a half pounds of the drug caffeine and exports it. The weight of the raw material and the lime, as I understand the statement of this manufacturer, makes it a great burden upon the industry.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not see at this moment how the difference in advantage between the English manufacturer and the American manufacturer will be affected or cured at all by this proposed law. Of course, the man who is nearer the source of production can always denaturize and manufacture the article and put it into smaller compass for sale abroad at a cheaper rate than the man who has to pay freight a longer distance.

Mr. STONE. The president of the Monsanto Chemical Works in a letter says this, if the Senator will let me read it to him——

Mr. SPOONER. I only want information about it.

Mr. STONE. He says:

> The German manufacturers are allowed to import this tea waste ad libitum, whereas the English manufacturers are also allowed to import this quality of goods—

That is, they purchase it abroad—from the place of production—

but under supervision of the Government—

So as to prevent any misuse of it to the detriment of the public health—who see that it actually enters into the manufacture of caffeine, so that there is no possibility of this quality of goods interfering with their tea laws.

Now, as against these conditions the American manufacturer of caffeine is compelled to denature the tea waste before importing, by adding 10 per cent of lime—for the purpose of making it unfit for food purposes—when it is allowed to enter into the United States as "crude drugs." The cost of the lime and the labor for this process at point of shipment is about 20 per cent of the cost of the goods, to which also must be added the additional heavy freight charges caused by the addition of this lime, making the actual cost to the American manufacturer almost 25 per cent more than the European manufacturers pay for the same goods at their factories.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me that this bill does not confine itself to tea waste. It provides that tea may be imported, which changes entirely the character of the statute which the Senator from Wisconsin cited.

Mr. SPOONER. The statute reads, "Tea, tea waste, tea siftings, or tea sweepings."

Mr. ALLISON. That covers the entire range of tea. At the present time tea can only be imported under bond. No tea can go into consumption until after it has been examined by tea experts, and if they reject any portion of the tea as not coming up to the standard the importation of that tea is absolutely prohibited—that is to say, it can not go into consumption. But under this proposed bill any importer can declare that he is importing this tea and this tea waste for manufacturing purposes, give bond that he will do it, and thereby the whole matter of the importation of it is subjected to the caprice or the discretion of the manufacturer. So if we are to provide a method to accomplish this object we should, it seems to me, provide that at the port of entry this tea or tea waste, or whatever it is, should be made unfit for consumption as food or drink. This bill leaves it to the manufacturer to take this tea and utilize it in his discretion for the purpose of manufacturing caffeine or whatever he desires to manufacture from it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I did not know the Senator had the floor. I was simply going to say, Mr. President, that this bill seems to have given rise to a great deal of debate, and is likely to give rise to more, and as there are a number of unobjected matters on the Calendar which can be passed I hope the Senator from Missouri will be willing to let the bill go over.

Mr. STONE. I am entirely willing to let it go over. As I stated, I think it better, after what has been said by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Iowa, that it should go over. The bill may be imperfect.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

UNLAWFUL WEARING OF MILITARY BADGES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] has withdrawn his objection to the consideration of House bill 58, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 58) to prevent the unlawful wearing of the badge or insignia of the Grand Army of the Republic or other soldier organizations.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

UNION OF ARIZONA WITH NEW MEXICO.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the order which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the order.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 500 additional copies of Senate Document No. 216, first session Fifty-ninth Congress.

Mr. KEAN. What is the document which it is proposed to reprint?

Mr. PATTERSON. It is a protest against the union of Arizona with New Mexico.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the order?

There being no objection, the order was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

LAPÈNE & FERRÉ.

The bill (S. 1532) for the relief of the legal representatives of the late firm of Lapène & Ferré was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This bill has heretofore been considered and passed by the Senate, but the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] entered a motion to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPOONER. That is a cotton-claim bill, Mr. President, and is one of a vast number involving not only several questions, but a good many million dollars. I entered the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed in order that I might read the report. I found from reading the report that it would be necessary to read a large number of documents to get at the real history of the claim.

Moreover, I wish to present, when I discuss very briefly the motion to reconsider, some information from the Treasury Department as to the status of this whole business. I do not see how the matter is reached on the Calendar now, unless it reaches my motion to reconsider.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie over with the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin pending.

Mr. SPOONER. I can call it up at any time, as I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At any time.

WILLIAM H. JOSLIN.

The bill (H. R. 8773) granting an increase of pension to William H. Joslin was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of William H. Joslin, late captain Company B, and major, Twenty-fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHTHOUSE AT ISLE AU HAUT HARBOR, MAINE.

The bill (S. 4095) to establish a light and fog-signal station at or near Isle au Haut Harbor, Maine, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to have established and constructed a light and fog-signal station at or near Isle au Haut Harbor, Isle au Haut, Me., at a cost not to exceed $14,400.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the time, and passed.

CAPE HINCHINBROOK (ALASKA) LIGHT-HOUSE.

The bill (S. 2703) to establish a light-house and fog signal on Cape Hinchinbrook, Hinchinbrook Island, Prince William Sound, in the district of Alaska, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to construct on Cape Hinchinbrook, Hinchinbrook Island, Prince William Sound, in the district of Alaska, a first-class light-house and fog signal, at a cost of not more than $75,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT BRADY MILITARY RESERVATION, MICH.

The bill (S. 2801) to withhold from sale a portion of Fort Brady Military Reservation, at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that that portion of the military reservation known as Fort Brady, in the city of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., bounded on the north by that part of Water street adjacent to the Government park, on the east by Brady street, on the south by Portage avenue, and on the west by Bingham avenue, be reserved from sale under the authority of the act of Congress authorizing the sale of Old Fort Brady, approved July 8, 1886, and that it be set apart for a site for a public building at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT CAPE SPENCER, ALASKA.

The bill (S. 2705) to establish a light-house and fog signal on Cape Spencer, at the entrance to Cross Sound, in the district of Alaska, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

The bill (S. 791) to promote the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service was announced as the next bill in order on the Calendar.

Mr. HALE. This is a very important bill, involving an entirely new principle of a retired list for this Service, and I must object to the consideration of this and also the next bill.

Mr. NELSON. I wish the Senator would allow the bill to be read and also the report of the committee, so as to place the information before the Senate. The bill has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Commerce, and there is a very valuable report from the Treasury Department on the subject. I shall be glad to have the bill and the report read.

Mr. HALE. Let them be read, and then let the bill go over under Rule IX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill and report will be read.

Mr. NELSON. I prefer that the bill should not lose its place on the Calendar.

Mr. HALE. The trouble is, if I agree to that and the Senator gets it read now, it may come up some time when I am not here, and no attention will be paid to it and it will be passed without discussion. It is a bill important enough to be thoroughly discussed. We ought not to make a retired list for any new branch of any service, in my judgment, and the bill can not be passed without pretty extended debate. I have no objection to the Senator having the report read now, but I shall ask that the bill go to the Calendar under Rule IX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill and the report will be read, and the objection of the Senator from Maine will be interposed after the reading.

Mr. HALE. I shall not be here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will make announcement of objection on the part of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. NELSON. After the bill and report shall have been read the bill will go over under the objection of the Senator from Maine.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will go to the Calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. HALE. And also the next bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will now be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. NELSON on the 18th instant.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is the bill now pending before the Senate the report on which is being read?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was read, and——

Mr. OVERMAN. I understood there was objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The objection was a conditional one. It was that the bill and the report should be read, and after the reading the bill should go to the Calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. NELSON. I will ask that the report be printed in the RECORD. There is no need of reading the report any further if it can be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The entire report is as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 26) to promote the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service, have had the same under consideration and beg to submit the following report, with the recommendation that the bill do pass with amendments:

The bill was referred by your committee to the Secretary of the Treasury for information bearing upon its merits and the propriety of its passage. That officer referred it to the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, who made a very full report thereon, which, together with the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting it with his concurrence, is hereto attached and made a part of this report.

The report of the General Superintendent discloses a serious condition of the Service that demands immediate relief to avert threatened disaster. This condition arises from the continual exodus from its ranks of numbers of its best men and the impossibility of filling the resulting vacancies with competent recruits. To overcome the difficulty a sufficient inducement must be provided to insure the retention of the desirable men still remaining in the Service and the enlistment of suitable recruits to fill existing and future vacancies.

It appears that there are two ways in which this may be done—one by increasing the compensation of the crews, the other by providing a system of retirement. Bills providing for both methods were introduced in the Fifty-eighth Congress, but the freinds of the Service advocated, in hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House, the bill for retirement in preference to the bills for increased compensation. The committee had several hearings upon the bill, but came to no agreement. In the meantime the situation in the Life-Saving Service has grown worse.

Of the two remedies proposed, that of retirement is shown to be the less expensive, the preference of the corps, and the most likely to restore the impaired efficiency of the Service and put it upon a basis which will not be readily affected by the fluctuations of wages in the business world in the future. The present bill provides for the application of this remedy. Its enactment would not form a dangerous precedent, nor could it be regarded as the beginning of a civil pension list. The adoption of a wise and desirable measure does not constitute a precedent for the adoption of an unwise and undesirable one, nor should a just claim for favorable action be denied for fear that its allowance would be cited in support of an unjust one. Every proposition for legislation of this nature should be decided upon its own merits.

No other civil branch of the Government can present claims to the benefit of retirement equal to those of the Life-Saving Service. None approach it as regards the dangerous character of its duties, and none, not even the Revenue-Cutter Service, to which Congress has recently granted retirement, has a closer alliance with the military arm of the Government, to which such provision has hitherto been confined. In fact, during the late war it formed an important part of the Navy under the command, for military purposes, of a naval officer, and was recognized as such by a special act of Congress, which provided for the continuance on duty of the crews of the life-saving stations upon the Atlantic coast through the summer months, contrary to usage, for the sole purpose of cooperation with the Navy. This connection continues in time of peace, and the Service is then also utilized for military purposes, particularly in naval drills and maneuvers. Among other considerations, therefore, the importance of keeping the Service in an efficient condition for the performance of its part in naval operations in time of war should not be overlooked while we are expending so much in other directions to strengthen the military power for the national defense.

Retirement as granted to the Army and Navy is the acknowledgment by the Government of a moral obligation on account of past meritorious service, and is a compensation for the loss of earning capacity incurred through injury, disease, or the devotion of the productive years of life to the performance of duty. On these grounds no servants of the Government are more entitled to consideration than the men employed in the Life-Saving Service. If the encouragement of patriotism is an additional reason for the grant to the Army and Navy, the encouragement of humanity, of which the Life-Saving Service is the highest national exponent, is equally worthy of the same recognition.

Your committee regard the men in the life-saving stations fully entitled to the benefits proposed to be given them by the bill without reference to the necessity of checking the decadence of the Service, but the present critical situation gives warning of the importance of speedy and effective action. The Life-Saving Service of this country has for many years, by universal consent, stood at the head of all similar institutions in the world. It has gained and maintained this exalted position partly through the superiority of its organization, but chiefly through the skill, the training, the conscientious devotion to duty, and the heroism of its sturdy crews, who have wrought achievements that have made them famous and reflected honor upon the nation. The country can not afford to be ungenerous with them, much less to allow the Service to sink into incompetency and disrepute.

The measure has the support of the principal commercial and maritime organizations of the country, and of the press generally. Several of the State legislatures have passed resolutions in its favor, it is urged by the chief officers of the Service and the Secretary of the Treasury, and the President has called special attention to the subject in his annual message to Congress.

The amendments proposed by the committee are as follows:

Page 2, line 12, strike out "officer of the Revenue-Cutter Service on duty as."

Page 2, line 17, after the word "it," insert "or who may hereafter be disabled in the Service."

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 22, 1906.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter transmitting bill S. 26, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, "to promote the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service," and asking for suggestions touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage.

The matter was referred to the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service for his report, which has been received and is herewith transmitted with my concurrence.

Respectfully,

L. M. SHAW, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE,
United States Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT LIFE-SAVING SERVICE,
Washington, January 22, 1906.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, for report, of a letter to you from the Committee on Commerce, United States Senate, dated December 8, 1905, transmitting Senate bill 26, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, entitled "A bill to promote the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service," and asking for suggestions touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage.

The bill provides for the creation of a retired list for superintendents of life-saving districts, keepers of life-saving stations, and members of life-saving crews (also referred to as surfmen), and specifies the rate of retired pay for each and the conditions under which these officers and men shall be eligible for retirement. It is an important one, and in order to supply the committee with the data essential to its proper consideration it will be necessary to explain the constitution of the service, its nature and extent, its peculiar features, and its present condition and needs.

ORGANIZATION.

District superintendents.—The Life-Saving Service as at present organized divides the sea and lake coasts of the United States (Hawaii and Porto Rico not included) into thirteen districts, each of which is under the direction of a district superintendent. These officers are required, upon appointment, to be not less than 25 nor more than 55 years of age. They must be able to read and write English and have sufficient knowledge of accounts to properly transact the district business, must be familiar with the line of coast embraced in their districts, and conversant with the management of lifeboats and other life-saving appliances. They are appointed after a competitive examination, in which all keepers in the district where the vacancy exists have been invited to participate. Their appointment, under the law, like that of the keepers and crews of the stations, is required to be made solely with reference to their fitness and without reference to political or party affiliations.

Their duties comprise the immediate superintendence of the several stations embraced in their respective districts. As disbursing officers, they pay the wages of the crews monthly, and make other expenditures as authorized by the Department. They also perform duties as inspectors of customs. They are required to enter into bonds in amounts varying from $10,000 to $50,000, according to their fiscal responsibility.

In addition to quarterly tours they are obliged to visit their stations on frequent other occasions as circumstances require, and to be present on occasions of wreck whenever practicable, but they are not required to take a place in the boat. They sometimes do so voluntarily. They are liable, however, to exposure in all kinds of weather in their frequent journeys along the coast during the active season, which embraces the most inclement portions of the year, in most instances extending for hundreds of miles along desolate coasts and distant from railroad facilities; often through storms and drifting snows, sometimes camping out and subsisting on rude and scanty fare, frequently making their way in small boats upon dangerous waters, and nearly always under circumstances as different from the comforts and luxuries of ordinary travel as can well be conceived.

Such hardships and dangers do not fall to the lot of many persons in civil life. That the risks incurred are of no slight importance is proven by the fact that out of the small number of persons who have held the position of district superintendent in the thirteen districts since the organization of the system two have perished by drowning; one escaped that fate only by mere chance after prolonged suffering in the water; one has sustained serious injury in the performance of duty, necessitating a painful surgical operation, as a result of which he has since died; and death has befallen three in consequence of exposure and hardship while on their official tours through their districts. Of the six who have died in the performance of duty but one breathed his last at home and among friends. Perhaps the saddest case of all is that of a superintendent who, upon learning of the stranding of a vessel in the midst of a blinding blizzard in the depth of winter, immediately set out alone late at night and made his way, through drifting snow, to the scene of the wreck, some 7 miles distant. As a result of that night's exposure he became nearly blind and his health was irrecoverably undermined. He has lately entirely lost his reason, which is also attributed to that night's dreadful experience.

The compensation of district superintendents varies from $1,700 to $2,000 per annum.

Keepers.—There are at present 278 stations, distributed as follows: Two hundred on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, sixty on the Great Lakes, seventeen on the Pacific (including a station at Nome, Alaska), and one at Louisville, Ky. (falls of the Ohio River). Each of these stations, excepting eight on the coast of Florida, known as houses of refuge, is manned by a keeper and a crew of surfmen varying in number from six to eight, according to the requirements of the various localities, aggregating in the whole about 2,100 men.

Keepers are appointed by the promotion of surfmen from the respective districts in which the vacancies exist, upon the nomination of the district officers and the recommendation of the general superintendent. The district officers are required to certify that the man recommended is the best qualified available man in the district, and that the nomination is made solely with reference to his fitness for the position and without reference to any other consideration whatever. The nomination must be accompanied by a certificate from a surgeon of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, showing that the candidate is physically sound and able-bodied.

Keepers are the captains of the station crews and are intrusted with the custody and care of the Government property at the stations, where they are required to reside, and with the general management and conduct of the latter, keeping a daily journal of all transactions of every kind and transmitting weekly transcripts thereof to the Department. They are also inspectors of customs, and as such look out for the Government interests in relation to dutiable goods on board of wrecked vessels and guard their respective precincts against smuggling. They are also constituted by law the guardians of all wrecked property until relieved of this responsibility by the owners or their agents. They conduct the daily drills of their crews and are held responsible for their proficiency in all the various duties which may be required of them. Of course their crowning and most hazardous duty is on occasions of shipwreck, at which they direct the operations for rescue, taking the steering oar in boat service and the prime responsibility at all times.

Their compensation is fixed by law at $900 per annum each, with the exception of the keepers of houses of refuge, each of whom receives $600 per annum.

Surfmen.—Surfmen are employed only after examination and certification by the Civil Service Commission. Applicants must be citizens of the United States not under 18 nor over 45 years of age; not less than 5 feet 6 inches in height; not less than 135 nor more than 205 pounds in weight; must reside in the district in which they seek employment and not more than 5 miles inland; must have had at least three years' experience as surfmen, sailors, or boatmen; must be able to read and write the English language, and must be good swimmers. They are enlisted like soldiers, but for a term of one year, and are reenlisted from year to year so long as they are found able-bodied and efficient and are willing to serve, with the design of making available the experience and knowledge which they have acquired in the service. Like soldiers, they are compelled before enlistment to undergo a strict physical examination, and upon admission must be absolutely sound, able-bodied men. They are also reexamined at each annual enlistment. The examinations are made by surgeons of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service.

Being enlisted, they at once repair to their respective stations and reside there, away from their families, for the most part upon lonely, desolate coasts, completely isolated from other human associations, and remain, on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, from the 1st day of August until the 31st of May following; upon the Lake coasts, from the opening of navigation in the early spring until its close some time in December, in both cases being exposed to the most rigorous weather of the year. On the Pacific coast they serve throughout the entire year.

During the period of actual service each man is permitted to be absent from the station one day, one at a time, in turn, in fine weather. No other absence whatever is allowed the surfmen except in urgent cases, when they are required to furnish acceptable substitutes, to whom the full amount of their salaries is paid.

Their duties at the station consist of daily practice and drill of some kind with the boats and apparatus, taking care of the station and the Government property, making such repairs and improvements as may be within the scope of their ability, and keeping an unremitting lookout by day over that portion of the coast which is visible from the station tower or other point of vantage. The night is divided into four watches, each taken by two surfmen. These men patrol the beach alternately to the right and left, one standing watch at the station while the other is on patrol. Where stations are within communicating distance each patrolman carries a check which is deposited at the end of the patrol, to be taken up by the man from the adjacent station, who in turn leaves his check. Where the stations are too widely separated to make such exchange of checks practicable a regular beat of several miles is assigned, at the limit of which is placed a key which the patrolman is obliged to reach and there make record of his presence upon the patrol clock which he carries for the purpose. During thick weather the patrols are continued throughout the twenty-four hours. In this way there is a practically continuous line of men patrolling up and down the entire dangerous portions of our coasts, always on the alert to warn vessels running into danger and to render prompt assistance in case of disaster, with another equal number of men keeping a sharp lookout from the stations, watching for any signal that may be made by their mates on patrol, and attending to telephone calls which may come from adjacent stations or from telephones located between stations.

The severity of this duty can hardly be conceived by the people accustomed to remain at night within doors. Some idea may be formed from the fact that men have perished in its discharge, while others have providentially escaped death only through timely rescue by their comrades. It is not at all unusual for patrolmen to meet with accidents which cripple them through stumbling in the dark over driftwood and unseen obstacles or losing their foothold upon the slippery ice banks, which are frequently piled many feet in height along the beaches, and a large proportion of the deaths which have occurred in the Service is due to disease contracted through exposure on patrol. It frequently happens during the prevalence of storms that the men are drenched by overflooding seas or by having to wade through the beach gullies, often waist deep or deeper. This duty is considered so important that it is never, under any circumstances, omitted, and its infraction is held to be unpardonable and is punished by dismissal. It is probable that there is no duty in any other branch of the Government service or in civil life that is at all comparable with this beach patrol in the degree of exposure, peril, and severe, exhausting toil which it involves. The guard or sentry duty of the soldier might be suggested, as also the night patrol of policemen in severe wintry weather, but the conditions under which these duties are performed are so dissimilar that there can be no comparison.

To the foregoing regular routine must be added their terrible and daring labors at shipwreck. This, of course, is their highest duty, and involves efforts almost superhuman and heroism carried to the very brink of deadly peril, and oftentimes to death itself. It is unnecessary to enlarge upon this feature, as their achievements are of world-wide repute. The extent of their services is attested in the annual reports of the Service by statistics showing great numbers of lives saved and vast amounts of property delivered from the perils of the sea. The record of the Service since the organization of the system, in 1871, shows the loss of life to be less than 1 per cent of the more than 100,000 persons imperiled within its effective scope.

The compensation of surfmen is fixed by law at $65 per month while actually on duty. On the Atlantic coast they are off duty during two months of each year, and on the Great Lakes they have nearly four months of idleness during the winter, when for a large number of them no other employment is open. They receive no allowances of any kind, being obliged to furnish their own uniforms and clothing, even to the storm clothes required on patrol and in wreck duty, and to maintain their mess at the station—employing a cook at their own expense or adding that work to their other duties—so that such of them as have families are compelled to contribute to the support of two households.

In addition to the officers and men whose qualifications, duties, etc., have been related above are the General Superintendent, who has general charge of the Service; a chief inspector of life-saving stations, who is an officer of the Revenue-Cutter Service detailed by the Secretary of the Treasury under the authority of law, and assistant inspectors in several of the districts, also detailed officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service. For these inspecting officers retirement has already been provided through their connection with the Revenue-Cutter Service.

PRESENT CONDITION AND NECESSITY OF REMEDIAL LEGISLATION.

At the present time the Service in several districts is in a seriously crippled condition for want of competent men to fill the station crews, and the difficulty of securing such as are properly qualified in sufficient numbers to supply the vacancies is constantly increasing. Numerous stations are without full crews of regularly enlisted men. In one station there is not a regular surfman enrolled; in another there is but 1, and several other stations have but 2 enlisted surfmen each. In one district only 5 out of 16 stations are manned with full crews of regulars. In another district there are but 2 stations out of 8, and in another but 2 out of 11, fully manned with regulars. Other districts are depleted in the same way to a considerable extent. New lists of eligibles from which to supply vacancies have recently been received from the Civil Service Commission. For one district where 24 vacancies exist there is but 1 eligible; in another, for 26 vacancies there are but 4 eligibles, and in another, for 34 vacancies there are but 9 eligibles. To supply these vacancies temporary men, obtained from wherever possible, are employed. In most instances these are greatly inferior professionally, physically, and morally.

The candidates upon the eligible lists are themselves much inferior, professionally, to those who formerly composed such lists. Even if it were possible to replenish the crews, the frequent changes, with the consequent necessity of constantly training inexperienced recruits to take the places of the tried and well-trained men leaving the Service, would be seriously detrimental. But when to this is added the fact that the men who are thus leaving in growing numbers are of necessity the best, since these can most readily secure better paying and more desirable positions elsewhere, while the class of men from which recruits must be drawn is steadily becoming less desirable, it is evident that the efficiency of the Service is being rapidly undermined. A striking proof of this is the great increase, year by year, in the number of dismissals necessary to be made for cause, the number of such last year being double that of the year before. In former years such a dismissal was extremely rare.

A continuance of this state of affairs invites disaster to the Service and reproach to the Government. To avert such a result and to restore and maintain the high standard of efficiency which has heretofore characterized the Service, legislation calculated to encourage the enlistment of competent men and to retain the best still remaining is imperative.

HOW SHALL RELIEF BE AFFORDED?

Only two methods of relief have been suggested as practicable: One, providing for a material increase in the wages of surfmen and keepers commensurate with the duties required of them and with the greatly increased cost of living since the present rate of pay was fixed; the other, providing for some such system of retirement as is proposed by the bill in hand.

While an increase of compensation sufficient to attract suitable men would doubtless afford a remedy, for a time at least, a number of objections to this, as compared with the other course, present themselves.

It is impossible to fix a rate of pay adjustable to the constantly changing scale of wages in the business world. What would be only just to-day may in a year or two be deemed extravagant, and the existence of such a condition would not be well for the Service nor for the Government. An attempt to reduce the rate would create a feeling among the men that they were being unjustly and meanly dealt with—for wage-earners never recognize that they are overpaid—and discontent and a tendency to demoralization would follow. This is not a mere conjecture or opinion. The rate of pay of surfmen has been changed by law seven times, including both raising and lowering, since the organization of the system, an average of once every five years, and the experience of the Service proves the statement.

The smallest increase for surfmen that would probably relieve the present difficulty is $10 per month. This would make their monthly pay while on duty the same that their immediate superiors, the keepers, now receive. To suitably compensate for the greater responsibility resting upon the latter, to facilitate the maintenance of proper discipline, to stimulate in the surfmen a healthy ambition to excel, by holding out the reward of a promotion worth aspiring to, and to mark the proper distinction in rank a proportionate increase in the pay of keepers would be necessary. This could hardly be less than $300 per annum. Bills providing for the above rates to keepers and surfmen were introduced in the Fifty-eighth Congress. A bill embracing the provisions of the present measure was also pending at the same time. A careful calculation was made, covering a period of twenty years, to ascertain the comparative cost between retirement at the present rate of wages, with all the stations fully manned, and an increase in the pay of the keepers and surfmen at the rates above specified, and it was found that the saving to the Government by retirement would be over 40 per cent in the case of surfmen, and in that of the keepers nearly 23 per cent. Taken together there would be a saving of about 35½ per cent, which in twenty years would amount to more than $1,750,000.

A greater advantage, however, than this saving in money would undoubtedly be derived by the Service in the promotion of its efficiency which retirement would produce. Such a provision, giving assurance to the men that after faithful and honorable service through a long series of years, or when advancing age should make them conscious of their waning physical powers, or when in the course of the performance of duty they should become incapacitated for further service they would not be thrown out to suffer in penury the rest of their lives, but would be provided with the means of a modest living and retain an honorable standing among their fellows, would not only retain the desirable men now in the Service, but would prove a great inducement for the enlistment in sufficient numbers of substantial men superior both in professional capacity and character to those now obtainable and who would adopt the profession as their life work. It is believed it would secure for the Service its pick from the best qualified surfmen upon our coasts, who, once in the Service, would become more valuable by the experience gained year by year and to whom the advantage of remaining would constantly grow greater as they approached the realization of the benefits of retirement.

Increased devotion to duty on their part as a means of insuring retention and an improved morale would be the attendant advantages to the Service. The men would not, as they do now, jump at offers of somewhat higher wages outside than they now receive, but would hesitate to accept even much higher compensation before they would give up permanent situations promising a fostering care after their useful laboring days have passed. As between the two remedies proposed for the relief of the present grave situation, the men of all grades in the Service are understood to be unanimously in favor of the one contemplated by the bill under notice.

OBJECTIONS TO RETIREMENT CONSIDERED.

Why, then, in view of the foregoing considerations, should it not be adopted? One, and the chief, objection that has been raised against the bill, is that its enactment would be the beginning of a civil pension list. This objection could be more consistently urged if Congress had not recently passed a bill providing for the retirement of disabled and superannuated officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service, a branch of the public service as indisputably within the domain of the civil service as is the Life-Saving Service. But it is not apparent how any other branch of the civil service could properly cite the granting of retirement in the case of either of the two services as a precedent. As to the Life-Saving Service, it is confidently asserted that no other branch can advance an equal claim to this protection. It annually saves a multitude of human lives and an amount of property largely exceeding in value the cost of its maintenance, and in doing this incurs dangers and hardships vastly greater than those that attach to any other civil branch of the Government. Only the Army and Navy render such hazardous service, and probably it was on account of the dangers attendant upon the occupation of those employed therein in time of war that pensions and retirement were accorded them.

Until the organization of the Life-Saving Service it is not recalled that there was any branch of the Government, other than the Army and Navy service, which was especially hazardous, and hence general pension legislation has been limited to them. The recent legislation in behalf of the officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service was granted on the ground that in time of war it was a part of the Navy. The Life-Saving Service has fully as strong a claim on this ground. During the Spanish-American war the Life-Saving Service was attached to the Navy and formed the principal part of the naval coast signal service. Under the authority of an act of Congress, passed upon the earnest recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, the stations upon the Atlantic coast were kept open and manned for active service during the months of June and July for the special purpose of cooperation with the Navy, when otherwise, under the law, they would have been closed. In his letter making the recommendation the Secretary of the Navy described the Life-Saving Service as a very important adjunct to the Navy and, in effect, stated that unless the enactment was made the plans and preparations of the Navy would be greatly crippled.

The station crews, for the purposes of the war, were under the command of Capt. John R. Bartlett, United States Navy, superintendent of the coast signal service, who, in his report to the Navy Department, speaks in the highest terms of the efficiency and importance of the connection. This connection has since been permanently established, and the Service is now as much a part, and as important a part, of the Navy in time of war as the Revenue-Cutter Service, and the connection is maintained both in peace and war, which with regard to the Revenue-Cutter Service, to whose officers retirement is allowed, is not the case. The events of the war took such a turn that it was impossible for the enemy to seriously threaten the coast, and consequently the opportunity did not arise for a practical demonstration of the great value of the coast signal service in case of an invasion by the enemy's ships, but the naval officer in charge of the system bears testimony that it would have effectually served its purpose if occasion had required, and that, as a matter of fact, it did render valuable service—in some instances of extreme importance—by advising the Navy Department of the movement of Government vessels, etc. Among such instances the most notable was the receipt at the life-saving station at Jupiter Inlet and its transmission therefrom of the message of Captan Clark, of the Oregon, when he made land off Jupiter and signaled that the Oregon had arrived with all on board well and ready for battle.

In time of peace the system is utilized by the Navy in various ways, but particularly in connection with the naval drill and maneuvers along the Atlantic coast, and the system is now being improved by the use of wireless telegraphy. It is a fortunate thing that in time of war the Life-Saving Service constitutes a line of signal stations along the ocean coast so distributed and equipped as to detect immediately and instantly report to naval headquarters the presence of an enemy's vessels, should any appear, and also that the training of the life-saving crews in the use of the international code of signals and signaling with the general service code happens to be also vitally useful in military operations. The adaptability of the life-saving stations as outposts or pickets upon the coast and the ease with which they can be utilized in war, without additional cost to the military establishment, are circumstances of great importance.

While it is thus shown that the Life-Saving Service is in fact an important adjunct to and, for military purposes, actually a part of the Navy under the command of naval officers, it is interesting to note how similar are the methods of employment, the routine of duties, the discipline and daily life of the life-saver to those of the soldier and naval sailor. Mr. William Livingstone, president of the Lake Carriers' Association, who, by reason of his official position, has been brought much in contact with the Life-Saving Service, especially upon the Great Lakes, and is thoroughly familiar with the organization and its work, in a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives, during the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, advocating a bill containing the same provisions for retirement as those in the present bill, which letter was printed in the report of a hearing before the committee, presents this matter quite effectively in the following extract:

"The Life-Saving Service has all the requisites which have been said to form the basis of pensions and retirement allowed to the Army and Navy.

"1. The men in the Life-Saving Service are enlisted, like men in the services mentioned, after a rigid physical examination, and a professional examination added. It is true that the specified term of enlistment is one year instead of three or four, but as a life-saver is entitled to reenlistment at the end of each year, if worthy and physically qualified, the result is the same except that he is examined as to his physical qualifications annually instead of triennially or quadrennially, as in the Army and Navy, which is to the disadvantage of the man, but an advantage to the Government, since the physically disqualified are so much more frequently eliminated.

"2. The service of the life-saver is dangerous, like that of the soldier and the naval sailor. Not so dangerous, perhaps, as that of the soldier in time of war, but much more dangerous in time of peace, which in the history of this country has been broken but four—it might almost be said three—times, excepting, of course, the Indian troubles upon the frontier. The dangers of the life-saver are constant. Probably they fully equal those of the Navy man, counting both war and peace. The Railway Mail Service is called a dangerous one, but the General Superintendent of that Service, in his annual report for 1901, in setting forth the extent of the dangers to which the railway mail clerks are exposed, deduces from data and figures which he gives, and which are taken from official sources, that the danger to the railway mail clerk is about 50 per cent as great as that to the life-saver.

* * * * * * *

"3. The daily routine of duty of the soldier and the life-saver are nominally the same, consisting of drill, guard duty, and battle. But the drill and guard or patrol duty of the life-saver is dangerous, which is not the case with the soldier in time of peace. The boat drill of the surfman is always hazardous, and has been frequently attended with drowning, while the night patrol of the coast in wintry storm is one of extreme hardship, as well as dangerous. Except as above shown, the main difference between the soldier and the life-saver appears to be that the former shoots to kill, while the latter shoots to save. If the soldier in battle is in a sense a mark for the enemy's bullet, so is the life-saver in his battle with the sea a mark for the enemy, which constantly lurks in the breakers prepared to overwhelm him."

Another objection that has been urged against the feature of retirement is that it is "unjust, unfair, and inequitable," in that it proposes to give a benefit which now inures only to men employed in the military arm of the Government, who receive a compensation in service far below that paid to those employed in the Life-Saving Service, the statement being made "that a soldier in the Army gets no more than $25 per month, including wages and allowances," while the surfman in the Life-Saving Service, occupying a position analogous to that of a seaman in the Navy or a private in the Army, "receives a compensation of $65 per month, and would thus receive for ten years' service nearly as much in wages as the soldier would get in thirty years."

This is a great mistake, arising from the fact that the soldier and naval sailor have allowances and other advantages which are equivalent to additions to their compensation that are not commonly understood, while the surfmen have no allowances or extra advantages whatever, their pay proper being all they can receive. To definitely meet this objection a statement was prepared comparing the pay of a surfman in the Life-Saving Service with the pay and allowances and prospects of advancement of an enlisted man in the Navy. The Navy was selected for comparison as being more nearly allied to the Life-Saving Service than the Army, and because definite figures were more accessible. This comparison proves conclusively that the lot of the enlisted man in the Navy is far preferable to that of the surfman as regards compensation, as well as in other respects.

A casual inquiry as to the emoluments of the soldier indicates that a thorough examination would show fully as favorable a result for him. A copy of this statement is appended hereto. No attempt has been made to bring it down to date, although legislation enacted since it was prepared has made a still greater difference in favor of the seaman. In this connection it may be pertinent to mention the fact that a careful tabulation of the actual pay and allowances on the retired list of the first 150 men in the Navy who were retired under the act of March 3, 1899, shows that they receive about $10 more per month than would the surfmen if retired under the provisions of the pending bill.

PRECEDENTS IN OTHER HAZARDOUS OCCUPATIONS.

The bill is in accord with the progressive spirit of the age. A large proportion of the largest and best managed railroad corporations, like the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, the New York Central and Hudson River, the Illinois Central, the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, the Southern Pacific, and many other companies, provide retirement and pensions for their employees, paying the entire cost of the allowances and charging it against operating expenses. Many other corporations, especially among those whose employees are exposed to unusual dangers and upon whose fidelity human life is dependent, do the same. Doubtless self-interest largely prompted the adoption of the plan by these corporations, for they all testify that its results are profitable; but it is also humanitarian and in harmony with the advancement of civilization. A similar system is provided by law for the benefit of policemen and firemen in nearly all our large cities, including the city of Washington, where it exists under the authority of Congress, the Government paying a portion of the cost.

The extensive adoption of the system, both by the best managed business concerns and by practically all our municipal organizations, proves that it is advantageous and profitable. It is certain that its application to the Life-Saving Service would be in the interest of economy, as hereinbefore shown. But aside from the question of pecuniary profit, some provision of the kind for those who have spent many of their best years in the faithful performance of exacting and hazardous duty, and for those whom advancing years and bodily injury or disease incurred in the line of duty have rendered infirm and disqualified for further service, is earnestly prayed for by the men composing the life-saving crews and is justly due them from the Government. Most of them are poor. The larger proportion are married, having families dependent upon them, and their wages have been so small that they could not accumulate much, even by practicing the strictest economy; and when the time comes for their separation from the Service they behold poverty and want staring them in the face. This is why the best of them are so numerously quitting the Service, to its grievous injury, while the times are good and they are still in possession of their health and vigor. Those who remain are for the most part held by the hope of the passage of this bill. All their official superiors, including the Secretary of the Treasury, as shown in his annual reports, and the President, as appears in his recent message to Congress, earnestly urge some relief of the nature herein recommended.

Respectfully,

S. I. KIMBALL,
General Superintendent.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

A COMPARISON BETWEEN THE PAY AND ALLOWANCES AND PROSPECTS OF ADVANCEMENT OF AN ENLISTED MAN IN THE UNITED STATES NAVY AND IN THE LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

A surfman in the Life-Saving Service is required upon entry to be thoroughly proficient in his trade. He must have had at least three years' experience as a surf fisherman, boatman, or sailor, five years being required to secure a marking of 100 in experience. He is required to undergo two thorough physical examinations, one as a part of his civil-service examination and another after having been selected from the eligible lists and within ten days before he enters upon his duty. He is, therefore, a thoroughly trained man to begin with, and receives the maximum pay of his grade at once. He learns his trade at his own expense, not at the expense of the Government.

The pay of the surfman is $65 per month while actually employed. The greatest period of employment, except at a few stations, is ten months in the year, and the least is five months. On the Great Lakes they serve eight to eight and a half months. The average annual pay is, therefore, $600, or $50 a month, for the entire year. Their prospects for promotion are about 1 in 7 to the grade of keeper, which pays $900 per annum, and 1 in 162 to the position of district superintendent, which pays from $1,700 to $2,000. This covers everything. They have no allowances of any nature, not even the storm clothes and heavy oilskins which they are obliged to wear in their wreck and patrol work. They have quarters at the station, where they are required to reside continuously during the active season, the only absence allowed being from sunrise (or in the keeper's discretion, after the completion of the daily drill) until sunset, one man at a time, in rotation, when the weather is favorable. This would mean at most once a week each if the weather were always fair. If they are absent overnight they lose their pay, which goes to a substitute, and also lose their next turn at day liberty.

Now let us see what the sailor gets. We are told that he gets $16 a month, and that sum is set over against the surfman's $65. This is incorrect and misleading. The following information, which is taken from the official publications of the Navy Department, gives something of an idea of what the sailor really gets. It doesn't cover the ground fully, for the reason that not all the perquisites and allowances to be had are set forth in the pay tables and other printed matter. One has but to talk with a sailor who knows the ropes or with an employee of the Department to learn that this is so. But these are enough to show how unjust is such a comparison.

To commence with the $16 man. The landsman who enters at $16 is the raw recruit from the interior, who perhaps has never seen a naval vessel or, for that matter, any vessel other than the small pleasure craft on inland waters. The only qualifications required of him are a body physically sound and a desire to serve his country—nothing more. He undergoes a strict physical examination, and the Navy, in common with the Army, has been able to set this standard high, because they have every county in every State to draw upon, and the Navy has even added a corps of native Filipinos. In the Life-Saving Service the physical examination is no less rigid and is repeated at much shorter intervals—every year, to the Navy's once in four years—and the choice of men is limited to those who are bona fide residents of a strip of land 5 miles in width along the coast.

Having passed the physical examination, our candidate for the Navy signs articles of enlistment at the recruiting station nearest to his home. These recruiting stations are maintained at all the principal points on the seaboard and the Great Lakes, supplemented by half a dozen traveling recruiting parties. Having enlisted, he is given an outfit of clothing amounting to $45, and at once commences to draw pay and subsistence. He is then sent to a receiving ship or training ship to receive the necessary elementary instruction. He is presumed to know nothing at all about naval matters when he enlists, but nevertheless draws pay and rations from the start. As soon as he shows adaptation to naval discipline and has learned the first duties of a sailor he is advanced to the next grade, which is ordinary seaman at $19. If he develops the required proficiency and intelligence, he is promptly advanced to the grade of seaman at $24 a month. A merchant sailor who enters the naval service is at once rated an ordinary seaman at $19, and as soon as he proves his efficiency and adapts himself to the naval life and usage is advanced to the grade of seaman at $24. He may even, if he shows a good record and is otherwise satisfactory, be enlisted at $24 at the start.

From these entrance grades to the ratings of chief petty officers at $60 or $70 a month, and on up to warrant officers at $1,300 to $1,800 per annum, with a commission in ten years carrying with it another advance in pay, and still upward to the grade of ensign, which puts him in direct line of promotion to the highest grades in the Navy—to captains and rear-admirals—it is simply a matter of the man's own efforts and ability and the necessary time and opportunity; simply a constant selection and elimination and the advancement of the fittest. Of course the higher places are comparatively few and hard to reach. It is so in every vocation in life, yet these places at the top are always held out as an incentive to the fellow at the bottom. "Small wages at the start, with good opportunity for advancement," is the legend that runs through every line of work, be it business, the professions, or politics. It is true of the Life-Saving Service to a small degree. It is true in the Navy to a much greater degree. As already stated, the surfman has 1 chance in 162 to reach a salary of from $1,700 to $2,000. The enlisted man in the Navy has 1 chance in 57 to reach a like sum, and even a chance, though it be small, to go on up to $5,000 and over.

Let us follow him step by step. Having reached the grade of seaman, at $24 a month, which depends entirely on the individual's own merit and in no way on vacancies, and which takes from one to six or eight months, he is in line for the various ratings as a petty officer. These are divided, for convenience, into seaman branch, artificer branch, messman branch, and special branch, the latter including hospital stewards, yeomen (clerks), and musicians. After a service of twelve months he may be rated a petty officer, third class, in one of these branches, at $30; in another year or more, depending on vacancies and his own merit, he may go up to second class, with pay of $35 or $40, and above this are the first-class and chief petty officers' ratings, with salaries ranging from $40 to $70, the latter figure being the pay of all chief petty officers.

No definite figures showing how long it takes a sailor to reach this grade are available, and it differs so much with circumstances and individuals that even the men in the Navy Department, who are familiar with the facts after handling the official records for a long period of years, are unwilling to hazard an estimate. Nevertheless, it is safe to say that no enlisted man in the Navy ever reaches retirement by age or length of service in the lower grades. In fact, it may be confidently stated that if it were feasible to secure definite figures to show the average pay and allowances of the average sailor for a period of thirty years it would equal, if not exceed, the pay of the surfman in the Life-Saving Service. The definite figures hereinafter given in the cases of warrant officers, who reach their positions after passing through the petty officers' grades, would seem to fully substantiate this statement.

Before going further up the scale of advancement open to the sailor let us look at the various allowances, for the rates of pay above stated do not by any means represent the total compensation received. They are supplemented by a long list of allowances and extra pay. There is, first, the ration provided "in kind," or its commutation at $9 a month. The practice of commuting the ration and allowing the various grades of men on board ship to provide their own mess, electing a caterer from among their number, has been tried very successfully on some of the naval vessels, with the result that the men have been able to secure ample and satisfactory provisions and still have something left over out of the ration money for such luxuries as they may elect to have or for spending money. Then, a very large and important item is the bonus of four months' pay upon reenlistment every four years. It may be said that this is the equivalent of the thirty days' annual leave which the Government so generously allows its civil employees; but the fact is that the sailor has his "shore liberty" all along through the four years of his enlistment, and this four months' pay is a bonus for reenlistment pure and simple. He may take the four months' leave, taking care to present himself for reenlistment a day or two before it expires, or he may reenlist the very next day, and in either case he gets the four months' pay. He also gets an increase in pay of $1.36 per month for each enlistment. Upon the completion of the second and subsequent enlistments with a good record there is also a good-conduct medal, with another increase of 75 cents a month.

When he is rated a seaman gunner or graduates in any of the branches taught at the Petty Officers' School, another $2 is added to his monthly wage. If assigned to duty as a gun captain, he draws another $5 a month for that. If assigned as a "gun pointer," he gets from $2 to $10 a month additional, according to the class of gun; if as a signalman, he gets $3, $2, or $1 as a first, second, or third class signalman. If he serves as crew messman, or in charge of the hold, or on a submarine vessel, or as coxswain to the commander in chief, he again has $5 per month added to his wage. As a landsman, at the very start he may begin sharing in these numerous extras as a jack-of-the-dust or lamplighter, with $5 a month for his trouble. And so on ad infinitum. Every inducement is held out to develop the best there is in him, with a chance to rise rapidly in the rank and wage scale in recognition thereof. And the man who, from lack of ambition, or inefficiency, or from whatever cause, does not show himself worthy of the generous provision made for him is soon disposed of by discharge at the end of his enlistment or sooner, with an entry on his record of "not desirable for reenlistment." He is the kind of man who doesn't stick in the Navy or anywhere else. Such a man would probably not be able to obtain admission into the Life-Saving Service under the requirements, but if he should he would be promptly dropped within his first six months of probation.

The average pay of the sailor in our Navy, therefore, taking into account the constant opportunity for advancement in so large a body of men, and the numerous allowances provided in recognition of any special aptitude he may show, is as large as or larger than that of the surfman, which to the uninformed appears at first glance so disproportionate.

Then, again, there are many provisions made for his health and general welfare in which the surfman does not share. He has constantly in attendance one or more physicians and surgeons of the highest standing in their profession which an exceedingly difficult entrance examination, with high salaries and naval rank, can secure. If he serves on board a naval vessel, with the exception of the very smallest, he is never out of sight of the doctor, who is prepared, with trained help and modern appliances and science, to minister to his every bodily ill. Should he be taken so seriously ill as to necessitate his transfer to a hospital, or if he is one of the very few who have not a doctor actually with them (last year only 1,000 out of the 30,000 to 35,000 enlisted men in the Navy and Marine Corps were so situated), he is sent at Government expense, and with his pay and allowances continued, to one of the naval hospitals maintained at every navy-yard or station, and even in Alaska, and Yokohama, Japan, not to mention Honolulu and Manila. The surfman, on the other hand, if he is sick and absent from his station, seeks his own physician, such as he may find in the sparsely populated districts along the coast, and at his own expense. He may make application for admission to a marine hospital, but goes there and returns at his own expense, and if his illness promises to be of long duration his place is declared vacant and he is out of the Service.

The sailor, also, has retirement after thirty years' service, and in computing this period, service during the civil war or the Spanish-American war is counted as double time. While the purpose of the Navy is war, and its excuse for existence during times of peace is to be prepared for war, yet as soon as an opportunity arises for it to serve the purpose for which it is maintained all kinds of extra allowances are made. The victorious admiral, and his captains and officers down to the last enlisted man, are showered with prize money, with advancement in rank and pay, with medals and honors galore, double time in computing retirement, advanced rank on the retired list, etc. We have twenty, thirty, forty years of peace, during which the sailor's life is never exposed to danger (probably 75 per cent of them never go into battle), and his health hedged about with doctors and hospitals, scientific fare, sanitary quarters, health-producing discipline and exercise—in short, every imaginable provision for his physical welfare. His mental and spiritual welfare are no less carefully looked after. Every ship and station has its carefully selected library, and the larger ones have their chaplain, who not only ministers to the spiritual wants of the sailors, but serves in the capacity of a schoolmaster, for which he is well qualified. The sailor has in this way every opportunity to improve his mind—to secure the education which will fit him for something better.

With the surfman it is different. He marches his weary miles in the soft spongy sand along the shore every night in the year, and is liable to be called into battle not once in thirty or forty years and behind half a foot of protective steel armor, but every time the storm rages, and in a small boat at the mercy of the elements. And he can not withdraw for breakfast, as did Dewey at Manila, but frequently wages a desperate struggle for his own and other lives for twenty-four or thirty-six hours at a stretch without a stop for food or rest, with ice forming on his body from every dash of spray and every wave he meets.

It has already been stated that the surfman has one chance in one hundred and sixty-two to reach a salary of from $1,700 to $2,000, and that the enlisted man in the Navy has one such chance in fifty-seven, and even a small chance to reach beyond that to possibly $5,000.

The following facts will substantiate this statement. The present strength of the Navy is slightly over 30,000 enlisted men. There are 525 officers (not including petty officers) in the grades to which entry is almost exclusively by promotion from the ranks. There is his chance in 57. There are at present five ensigns who have been appointed from the warrant officer corps during the last three years, under authority of a recent act of Congress which authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to appoint six each year. These are now in direct line of promotion, in turn, with the other line officers, and as they are all young men—average age, 33 years—they have every prospect of reaching the higher grades. The average length of service of these five men in the enlisted grades and as warrant officers—from first enlistment to their appointment as ensigns—was sixteen years and nine months.

The various steps from petty officers upward to which an enlisted man may attain are about as follows:

First, there are the mates. By a curious anomaly they are neither enlisted men nor officers, and yet they are both and enjoy some of the advantages of each. They are men who have served long and faithfully as petty officers, who are held to be worthy of something better, but are barred from promotion to warrant officers by reason of age or otherwise. They are rated as mates, which to all intents and purposes places them with the warrant officers. Those appointed prior to August 1, 1894, receive $1,200 at sea and $900 on shore, while those appointed since that date receive $900 at sea and $700 on shore duty. In common with warrant officers, they receive quarters or commutation thereof at $24 a month, the same, by the way, as that allowed a junior-grade lieutenant in the Navy or a second lieutenant in the Army or Marine Corps. In their capacity as enlisted men they also receive their ration or its commutation at $9 a month. They enjoy the pension and retirement privileges of commissioned and warrant officers.

Then there are the warrant officers, of which there are at present 464—boatswains, gunners, carpenters, sailmakers, warrant machinists, and pharmacists. Their pay ranges from $1,300 up to $1,800 per annum, with commutation of quarters at $24 a month, and a fuel allowance the same as allowed the lower grades of commissioned officers in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. For service on shore "beyond the limits of the States comprising the Union" they have a 10 per cent increase in pay. The average length of enlisted service of these men has not been calculated, but in glancing over the list printed in the official Navy Register one man is found who was appointed a boatswain after eight months and twenty-five days' enlisted service, another with less than two years to his credit, one with four and a half years, and 32 out of a total of 116 with less than ten years' enlisted service.

Of the gunners, we find that 55 out of 100 had less than ten years' enlisted service. Of the carpenters, a considerable proportion are appointed directly from ship carpenters at navy-yards, by competitive examination. Enlisted men compete with these civilian navy-yard carpenters, on an equal footing, and yet we find that out of a total of 73, 25 of the present corps were enlisted men, with an average length of service of six years and ten months, and seven of these had less than four years—a single enlistment. Warrant machinists, the actual bona fide engineers of our Navy, are appointed almost exclusively from the ranks, there being but two exceptions out of the 150 men comprising the corps. There are three who have had less than one year's enlisted service, 22 between one and two years, 49 between two and five years, and only 27 with over ten years' enlisted service.

Boatswains, gunners, carpenters, and sailmakers who have served ten years in their respective grades are commissioned chief boatswains, chief gunners, chief carpenters, and chief sailmakers, ranking "with but after ensign." This provision will doubtless in due time be extended to include the warrant machinists, which is a comparatively new corps, having been established to provide engineers for the Navy when the former engineer officers were consolidated with the line in 1899. Nominally, the line officers are still assigned to engineer duties, but in point of fact the warrant machinists are the men who watch over and live in constant contact with the marvelously complicated machinery of our modern floating forts, and upon whom the responsibility for their efficiency primarily rests.

Of the officers in these grades of commissioned warrant officers, if that term be permissible, seventeen entered the naval service as enlisted men, and have served an average of exactly thirty years up to the 1st of January last, including their enlisted service, their service as warrant officers, and nearly four years in their present grade. They therefore reached this rank in about twenty-six years, and two have actually had less than twenty years' service in all since their first enlistment.

Their pay is given in the pay table as $1,400. To this is added 10 per cent for each five years' service (counting all service in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps), up to 40 per cent. Their pay is therefore actually $1,960, and to this is added a number of other extra amounts. There is the 10 per cent increase for service on shore outside of the United States, making the pay of those serving in Alaska, the Philippines, Cuba, Porto Rico, or Hawaii, $2,156 per annum. Then there are the quarters, or commutation, at $24 a month, and fuel allowance, as already described.

Another item not to be despised is traveling expenses. Naval officers, including these chief warrant officers, warrant officers, and mates, receive 8 cents per mile for all travel under orders, including travel to their homes on leave, or back to duty, which is considered as under orders. Officers are constantly being transferred from one station to another, from one squadron to another, from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast, and from the United States to the Philippines, the South Atlantic or European squadrons, etc., and in the course of a few years an officer's allowance for mileage over and above actual necessary traveling expenses is no small item.

And then there is the last and most important place of all to which the enlisted man in the Navy may aspire, that of ensign, which is open annually to 6 men who shall prove worthy from among the 500 warrant officers. True, it is a small chance, with the numerous restrictive qualifications presumably intended to guard against the admission of men whose lack of early education and training would unfit them for the important and delicate duties as representatives of their Government which often devolve upon naval officers, however thoroughly they may be qualified professionally. But the fact remains that the door is open for the enlisted man to attain to the highest grade in the Navy, and to the extent that he proves himself worthy of such advancement and the wisdom of the experiment is proven, it will doubtless be opened wider and wider, until the enlisted man will be on an equitable footing with his more fortunate brother, who reaches his high position more directly and rapidly by way of the Naval Academy.*

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection on the part of the Senator from Maine, the bill will go to the Calendar under Rule IX.

THE REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

The bill (S. 3044) to promote the efficiency of the Revenue-Cutter Service was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the objection of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], heretofore interposed, the bill will go to the Calendar under Rule IX.

NATIONAL CEMETERY AT SALISBURY, N. C.

The bill (S. 1304) for the construction of a driveway and approaches to the national cemetery at Salisbury, N. C., was announced as the next business in order; and was read.

Mr. TELLER. What committee reported the bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. I hope the report on the bill may be read. It is recommended by the Secretary of War and by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TELLER. The Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator ask that the report be read?

Mr. TELLER. I do not ask for the reading of the report. I wanted to know what committee reported the bill. I understand the Military Affairs Committee did.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was reported by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TELLER. That is all right.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment.

Mr. McCREARY. I should like to hear the report read, or have an explanation made by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I will make an explanation. At the city of Salisbury there is a national cemetery, and the Government has spent a hundred thousand dollars or more in beautifying it and in erecting a wall. The cemetery abuts on a railroad. There is a fill 15 feet high. There is no driveway. There is no way whatever to get to the cemetery. There were 12,700 Union soldiers buried there, 11,000 of whom are unknown dead.

It is the purpose of the bill to tunnel the railroad in order that people may get to the cemetery. As it is now, as shown

* But a few weeks elapsed after the above paper was written before the prediction contained in the last sentence was fulfilled by the act approved April 27, 1904, which provides, among other things, for the appointment of 12 warrant officers annually to be ensigns. Under this provision 9 have qualified and been commissioned thus far, making a total of 14 warrant officers promoted to ensign since such advancement has been possible. The same act also provides that warrant officers shall be commissioned after six instead of ten years' service as such.

from the report and the map, there is nothing but a lane. The Southern Railway is double tracking its road, which will take up the lane and therefore there will be no way to get to it at all. The only way pedestrians can get to it now is to walk down a fill 15 feet high to the gate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the first word, "That," insert "subject to the approval of the Secretary of War;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, the sum of $15,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for purchasing right of way and approaches and of constructing proper driveways and approaches, of macadam or other suitable material, from the city of Salisbury to said national cemetery, the beginning, direction, and terminus of said driveway and approaches to be determined by the Secretary of War; said sum of money, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of said Secretary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KEAN. I think the preamble ought to be stricken out. I do not think we ought to put it on the statute books.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection.

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection to the bill, but I do not think it is worth while to put the preamble in. I move to strike out the preamble.

The motion was agreed to.

DAVID HORNER.

The bill (S. 2056) to correct the military record of David Horner was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue by virtue of this act.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the military record of David Horner so as to show that he was enrolled in the service of the United States Army as a volunteer in Company K, Fifty-sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, November 1, 1861, and was honorably discharged on the 2d day of February, 1862: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue by virtue of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH F. RITCHERDSON.

The bill (S. 2054) authorizing the Secretary of War to place the name of Joseph F. Ritcherdson on the rolls of Company C, One hundred and twenty-second Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and issue him an honorable discharge, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place the name of Joseph F. Ritcherdson on the rolls of Company C, One hundred and twenty-second Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, as a musician, and to issue to him a certificate of honorable discharge from the service of the United States as such musician, to the end that he may have the benefit of all legal rights pertaining to such service of the soldier.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERKINS. I think the preamble should be stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from California moves to strike out the preamble.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES W. HOUSER.

The bill (S. 728) to correct the military record of James W. Houser was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of James W. Houser, late of Company E, Twelfth United States Infantry, and to grant him an honorable discharge from the military service of the United States. But no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE H. WHITE.

The bill (S. 729) for the relief of George H. White was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to revoke and set aside so much of General Orders, No. 14, Headquarters Department of the Ohio, Cincinnati, Ohio, March 1, 1863, as approved the finding and sentence of the general court-martial dismissing Capt. George H. White, Nineteenth Regiment Michigan Infantry Volunteers, and to issue to him a certificate of discharge as of date March 1, 1863. But no pay, bounty, compensation, or allowance shall accrue to said George H. White by virtue of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SALISBURY, N. C.

The bill (S. 1305) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Salisbury, in the State of North Carolina, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, to strike out, after line 17, page 2, down to and including line 7, on page 3, in the following words:

If, upon consideration of said report and accompanying papers, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem further investigation necessary, he may appoint a commission of not more than three persons, one of whom shall be an officer of the Treasury Department, which commission shall also examine the said proposed sites, and such others as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate, and grant such hearings in relation thereto as they shall deem necessary. And said commission shall, within thirty days after such examination, make to the Secretary of the Treasury written report of its conclusions in the premises, or documents taken by or submitted to them, in like manner as hereinbefore provided in regard to the proceedings of said agent of the Treasury Department, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon finally determine the location of the building to be erected.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

The building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and to contract for the erection and completion thereon of a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices in the city of Salisbury and State of North Carolina, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $75,000.

Proposals for the sale of land suitable for said site shall be invited by public advertisement in one or more of the newspapers of said city of largest circulation for at least twenty days prior to the date specified in said advertisement for the opening of said proposals.

Proposals made in response to said advertisement shall be addressed and mailed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall then cause the said proposed sites, and such others as he may think proper to designate, to be examined in person by an agent of the Treasury Department, who shall make written report to said Secretary of results of said examination and of his recommendation thereon and the reasons therefor, which shall be accompanied by the original proposals and all maps, plats, and statements which shall have come into his possession relating to the said proposed sites.

The building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from North Carolina to state the population of the town of Salisbury.

Mr. OVERMAN. At the census taken last year there were over 11,000. The population has more than doubled in the last few years. The Southern Railroad Company has located its shops near there.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a little time ago I was looking up some statistics in regard to public buildings. I find we have appropriated money for public buildings in towns of 3,000 in some instances, and I think in one instance I discovered that a town of even less than 3,000 was given a public building. It seemed to me that that was not very good legislation. I think we ought not to appropriate money for public buildings in towns that certainly have less than 10,000 population. It would seem to me so.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Let me call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to the fact that in locating public buildings it is not a question of population so much as it is a question of the necessity for the building. For instance, a town of three or four thousand inhabitants, where there is a United States land office, a second-class post-office, and a term of the United States court held, there certainly is a necessity for a public building regardless of the population.

Mr. GALLINGER. I quite agree to that, Mr. President, but I will add to what I said that in the investigation I made I found a good many instances where there was simply a post-office and yet a public building had been erected in a town of very small size. I do not know how it may be in this instance; I do not know whether there is a court held at Salisbury or not;

but it is a town of very considerable size, and I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. From the standpoint of population I think the town is certainly entitled to a public building.

Mr. TELLER. I wish the Senator from New Hampshire would tell us in what part of the country small towns are getting public buildings.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that those bills I discovered were passed several years ago. I do not know the exact date, but I can furnish the Senator some instances, though not offhand.

Mr. TELLER. I was not aware that we were doing anything of that kind now, for we have been rather strict, I think, about the size of the towns.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think lately we have.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEVI J. BILLINGS.

The bill (S. 661) for the relief of Levi J. Billings was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Levi J. Billings, of Rhinelander, Wis., $276, for services as second lieutenant and traveling allowance.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM S. DUNN.

The bill (S. 659) granting an honorable discharge to William S. Dunn was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue by virtue of this act.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to revoke the discharge without honor heretofore issued to William S. Dunn, private in Company F, Third Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and to issue in lieu thereof to said Dunn an honorable discharge from the service of the United States: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue by virtue of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INSPECTION OF STEAM VESSELS.

The bill (S. 3724) to amend section 4400 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the inspection of steam vessels, was announced as next in order on the Calendar, and the Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 12707.

STATEHOOD BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, which was reported from the Committee on Territories with amendments.

THE AMENDMENTS NOT VITAL.

Mr. DICK. Mr. President, your Committee on Territories has favorably reported H. R. 12707, with amendments. These amendments do not affect any of the vital features of the bill, and can by brief reference thereto be made plain. The committee proposes to change the number of delegates to the constitutional convention for the new State of Oklahoma from 112 to 110. The House bill provided that 55 of the delegates should be elected by the people of the Territory of Oklahoma and 55 by the people of the Indian Territory, and 2 should be elected by the electors residing in the Osage Reservation, in the Territory of Oklahoma. The population of these two Territories is about equal. No man can tell accurately which contains the larger number. To give two delegates to the electors residing in the Osage Reservation, in the Territory of Oklahoma, would give an advantage in the constitutional convention to that Territory—an advantage which your committee thinks inadvisable. The committee has therefore provided that both Territories be given the same number of delegates in the convention.

THE ELECTION BOARD FOR THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

The House bill provides that the judges of the United States court of appeals for the Indian Territory shall apportion said Territory into fifty-five districts for the purpose of said convention. Your committee has amended that provision by substituting for said board the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes and two judges of the United States courts for the Indian Territory, to be designated by the President, who shall constitute a board to apportion said Territory into election districts. The next amendment, which is also found on page 3, provides that the official who is to order said election of delegates aforesaid, representing the Indian Territory, shall be the judge, senior in service, of the United States courts in the Indian Territory, instead of the judge, senior in service, of the United States court of appeals of said said Territory, and omits the provision, because the committee deems it unnecessary, that said proclamation need fully specify and announce such apportionment; and the time within which said order for election of delegates aforesaid shall be designated is increased from four months after the approval of this act to six months. The sentence commencing with line 20, page 3, and all of page 4 down to and including the first three words in line 17 of page 4, is eliminated and the following provision substituted therefor:

ELECTION LAWS OF OKLAHOMA TO APPLY.

The election for delegates in the Territory of Oklahoma and in said Indian Territory shall be conducted, the returns made, the result ascertained, and the certificates of all persons elected to such convention issued, in the same manner as is prescribed by the laws of the Territory of Oklahoma regulating elections for Delegates to Congress. That the election laws of the Territory of Oklahoma now in force, as far as applicable and not in conflict with this act, including the penal laws of said Territory of Oklahoma relating to elections and illegal voting, are hereby extended to and put in force in said Indian Territory until the legislature of said proposed State shall otherwise provide, and until all persons offending against said laws in the election aforesaid shall have been dealt with in the manner therein provided. And the United States courts of said Indian Territory shall have the same power to enforce the laws of the Territory of Oklahoma, hereby extended to and put in force in said Territory, as have the courts of the Territory of Oklahoma: Provided, however, That said board to apportion districts in Indian Territory shall, for the purpose of said election, establish and define the necessary election precincts, and appoint three judges of election for each precinct, not more than two of whom shall be of the same political party, which judges may appoint the necessary clerk or clerks; that said judges of election, so appointed, shall supervise the election in their respective precincts, and canvass and make due return of the vote cast, to said board, which shall constitute the ultimate and final canvassing board of said election, and they shall issue certificates of election to all persons elected to such convention from the various districts of the Indian Territory, and their certificates of election shall be prima facie evidence as to the election of delegates.

The object of this amendment is to make more clear and specific the intention of the original bill to extend the election laws of the Territory of Oklahoma to the Indian Territory, including the penal laws of the Territory of Oklahoma relating to elections and illegal voting, and the United States courts of the Indian Territory are given jurisdiction to enforce said laws. The board heretofore provided for the purpose of apportioning election districts in the Indian Territory is to appoint the judges of election and the canvassing board of said election, and it is made the duty of this board to issue election certificates to all persons elected to such convention from the Indian Territory. The amendment effects no radical change, but, it is believed, strengthens and makes clearer the original provision.

GUTHRIE TO BE THE CAPITAL TILL 1915.

The provision that the capital of the new State of Oklahoma shall be Guthrie until 1915, but may, after said year, be located by the electors of the State, is amended by the addition of the word "permanently" after the word "located," for the reason that the committee believes by that time the people of the State will be ready to make a permanent location of the capital.

ELECTION FUND INCREASED TO $150,000.

On page 9 the addition of the words "connected with," after the word "person," in the third line, and the addition of "or other disposition" after the word "sale," in the fourth line, are intended to strengthen the penal provisions of the prohibition law provided for the Indian Territory. In section 5, on page 11, the appropriation made from the Treasury to defray the expenses of the elections in the Territory of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory is increased from one hundred thousand to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Disbursements are to be made by an appointed officer, and any portion of said sum not needed for that purpose will remain in the Treasury. Your committee thought it advisable to increase this appropriation by the sum of $50,000.

BOUNDRIES OF CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICTS.

On pages 12 and 13 appear the boundaries of the proposed five Congressional districts for the new State of Oklahoma. The committee has changed the boundaries of district No. 4 and district No. 5 in order to make them correspond with the boundaries provided in the bill which was adopted in this body one year ago. The committee believes that these old boundaries constitute a fair and just division for the intended purpose.

On page 13, lines 12 and 18, your committee has eliminated the words "to the Sixtieth Congress."

INVESTMENT OF SCHOOL FUNDS.

On page 14 appears the provision for the appropriation of the sum of $5,000,000 for the use and benefit of the common schools of the State of Oklahoma, in lieu of sections 16 and 36 and other lands in the Indian Territory which can not be appropriated for that purpose, being already disposed of. The said appropriation of $5,000,000 is to be held and invested by the State in trust for the use and benefit of the public schools of said State. The original bill, as passed by the House, provides that the interest on said bonds shall be paid quarterly. It seemed to your committee better sale might be made of these bonds if that provision were eliminated, and the words "paid quarterly," in the fifth line of page 15 have been stricken out. Section 10 of said bill provides for the appraisal and sale at public sale of sections 13 and 33, donated for school purposes, preference to purchase being afforded to the lessee at the time of such sale. Before any such land shall be sold the land and improvements thereon are to be appraised separately. The purchaser at such sale shall pay to the leaseholder the appraised value of said improvements and to the State the amount paid for said lands, "exclusive of the appraised value of improvements." This last phrase, "exclusive of the appraised value of improvements," is an amendment offered by your committee for the purpose of removing any doubt which may exist as to the meaning of that part of the section. It appears as an amendment in lines 8 and 9 on page 19.

FEDERAL JUDICIAL CIRCUITS.

Section 13, found on page 20, provides that the new State of Oklahoma shall constitute two Federal circuits for Federal courts, the present Territory of Oklahoma constituting the western district and the Indian Territory constituting the eastern district. Provision is made in that section for sessions of the circuit and district court at four places each year in the eastern district and four places each year in the western district. Your committee has thought all the ends of justice could be fully met by holding sessions of these courts at three places in each district instead of four, and has stricken out the provision for court sittings at Vinita, in the present Indian Territory, and at Lawton, in the present Territory of Oklahoma. These changes comprise the amendments proposed on page 20, lines 23 and 24; page 21, lines 2, 12, 16, and 17.

The provision on page 22, that the fees and compensation allowed the marshal, district attorney, and clerk of said Federal courts shall be the same now allowed to officers performing similar service to the United States in the Territory of Oklahoma is changed to read "other districts of the United States." The reason for this change is apparent and needs no comment.

LAWS OF OKLAHOMA EXTENDED TO ALL THE NEW STATE.

The word "statutes," in line 9 of page 22, is changed to the word "laws," so as to extend the "laws" now in force in the Territory of Oklahoma, as far as practicable, to all of the new State until changed by the legislature thereof.

The time for taking appeals and writs of error from final judgments of appellate courts of said Territories at the time of the admission of the new State is reduced from six months to three months. (See line 20, p. 23.)

TRANSFER OF CASES FROM TERRITORIAL TO FEDERAL COURTS.

The words "except as to time and parties" was stricken out of line 20, page 24. In the sixteenth section of the bill, which provides for the transfer of cases from the Territorial courts to the proper Federal courts, is the limitation of said section, "that said transfer shall not be made in any case where the United States is not a party except on application of one of the parties in the court in which the cause is pending, at or before the second term of such court after the admission of said State." The section goes on to say that "the proceedings to effect such transfer, except as to time and parties, to be the same as are now provided by law for the removal of causes from a State court to a circuit court of the United States." The proposed amendment, as stated, strikes out the words "except as to time and parties."

FIRST TWENTY-TWO SECTIONS RELATE TO OKLAHOMA AND INDIAN TERRITORY.

The first twenty-two sections of the bill relate exclusively to the admission of the Territory of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory as one State under the name of Oklahoma, and attention has been called to all the amendments proposed in these sections.

SECTIONS 23 TO 41 RELATIVE TO ARIZONA AND NEW MEXICO.

Sections 23 to 41, inclusive, provide for the admission of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico as the State of Arizona. The amendments proposed in these sections are few in number, and do not affect any of the questions in dispute.

INDIANS NOT TAXED NOT TO BE CITIZENS.

The provision in section 25, on page 30, that "the constitution shall be republican in form and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color," is amended by adding "except as to Indians not taxed." (Line 9, p. 31.) They are not citizens, and the new State should not be required to treat them as such until they shall emerge from a condition of wardship and become full-fledged citizens.

CAPITAL TO BE AT SANTA FE UNTIL 1915.

The sixth paragraph of section 25, page 32, provides that the capital of the State shall temporarily be at the city of Santa Fe, and shall not be changed therefrom before 1915, but that the location of said capital may after such year be fixed by the electors of said State. Your committee, for the same reasons that actuated it in the case of Oklahoma, has amended this section by inserting the word "permanent" before the word "location," line 18, page 33.

SELECTION OF LIEU LANDS BY THE STATE.

Section 36, on page 41, which exempts all mineral lands from grants made by this act and provides for the selection by the State of an equal quantity of other unappropriated lands of the State in lieu thereof, has inserted an amendment in lines 3, 4, and 5, page 42, providing that said selection is to be made "by the commission provided for in section 35, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior." As appears from section 35 of this act, upon the same page, said commission is to be composed of the governor, surveyor-general, and attorney-general of said State.

ELECTION FUND INCREASED TO $175,000.

The only other amendment proposed, in the concluding section, No. 41, increases the appropriation for the constitutional convention of the proposed State of Arizona from $150,000 to $175,000, with further provision that any expense incurred in excess of said sum of $175,000, instead of $150,000, as is provided in the House bill, shall be paid by said State.

THE BILL RECOMMENDED BY PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT.

The last annual message of the President contained the following paragraph:

I recommend that Indian Territory and Oklahoma be admitted as one State and that New Mexico and Arizona be admitted as one State. There is no obligation upon us to treat territorial subdivisions, which are matters of convenience only, as binding us on the question of admission to statehood. Nothing has taken up more time in the Congress during the past few years than the question as to the statehood to be granted to the four Territories above mentioned, and after careful consideration of all that has been developed in the discussion of the question I recommend that they be immediately admitted as two States. There is no justification for further delay, and the advisability of making the four Territories into two States has been clearly established.

THE TERRITORIAL CONDITION TEMPORARY ONLY.

The House of Representatives acted favorably upon that recommendation and has passed a bill in accordance therewith. Your Committee on Territories makes the same recommendation. It has been the well-understood policy of this Government since the formation of the Union to treat the Territorial condition as temporary only, a sort of preparation for admission into the full bond of union and the responsibilities of statehood as soon as the time has been reached when the applicant can take its place in the family with sufficient area and population, and possessing not only the possibility, but the probability, of being a worthy member of the Union.

STATEHOOD NECESSARY FOR FULL DEVELOPMENT.

As the time comes when a boy should be thrown on his own resources to develop his capabilities and to show the material that is in him in order that he may attain the full stature of self-reliant independence, so the time comes when a Territory within the Union should be granted statehood in order that it may assume the responsibility of self-government, for only by self-government can the highest possibilities of a people be developed.

THIS HAS BEEN AMERICAN TERRITORY SIXTY YEARS.

All of this territory under consideration in this bill has belonged to the United States for practically sixty years, and we believe the time has come when the question should be forever settled and the relations of their inhabitants to the other people of the United States be definitely and finally fixed. To that end the committee believes that the general interest of the entire Union demands that the Indian Territory and Oklahoma be admitted as one State and New Mexico and Arizona be admitted as another State.

CONGRESS HAS ABSOLUTE POWER OVER ADMITTING STATES.

Section 3, Article IV, of the Constitution provides:

New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

Paragraph 2 of the same section declares:

The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

There can be no question that the Congress has full and absolute power to pass this bill or to make any division or combination of land within the limits of the United States which is still in the Territorial condition. There is no proposition here to form a new State within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor to add to or take territory from any State already within the Union. The guaranty of a republican form of government is a guaranty to the States within the Union and not a guaranty to any Territory not yet formed into a State. The land within the proposed State of Oklahoma was part of the Louisiana Purchase, except the long arm running out to the west, which constitutes Beaver County. This county was formerly part of Texas, but was renounced by her on her admission to the Union because it lay north of the parallel of 36° 30′ and slavery was excluded therefrom by the terms of the Missouri Compromise. The Territories of New Mexico and Arizona were acquired from Mexico by the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo, in 1848, and the Gadsden treaty, or purchase, in 1853, except the land east of the Rio Grande River, which was once part of Texas.

PROVISIONS OF GUADALUPE-HIDALGO TREATY.

Article 8 of the first treaty gave to the inhabitants of the conquered territory the privilege of retaining the title and rights of Mexican citizens or to acquire those of citizens of the United States. They were, however, under the obligation of making their election within one year from the date of exchange of ratifications of that treaty—and those who shall remain in said territories after the expiration of that year without having declared their intention to retain the character of Mexicans, shall be considered to have elected to become citizens of the United States.

Article IX of the treaty reads as follows:

Mexicans who, in the territories aforesaid, shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic, conformable with what is stipulated in the preceding article, shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States and be admitted at the proper time (to be judged of by the Congress of the United States) to all the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States according to the principles of the Constitution; and in the meantime shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction.[a]

REAFFIRMED IN THE GADSDEN TREATY.

The fifth article of the Gadsden treaty provides that all the provisions of the eighth and ninth articles of the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo should apply to the territory ceded by that treaty.[b] There is no question at all that the letter and the spirit of that treaty obligation has been strictly adhered to by the United States. The citizens of these Territories have, ever since that treaty was proclaimed, been maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction. That treaty guaranteed to the inhabitants of that territory that at the proper time, which is to judged of by the Congress of the United States, they would be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and be admitted to all the enjoyment of rights of citizens of the United States, according to the principles of the Constitution. The Territorial act of February 24, 1863, for the organization of the Territory of Arizona, contained the provision that—

THE ARIZONA TERRITORIAL ACT.

Nothing in the provisions of this act shall be construed to prohibit the Congress of the United States from dividing said Territory or changing its boundaries in such manner and at such times as it may deem proper.

And this act also contained the following provision:

Provided further, That said government shall be maintained and continued until such time as the people residing in said Territory shall, with the consent of Congress, form a State government, republican in form, as prescribed in the Constitution of the United States, and apply for and obtain admission into the Union as a State on an equal footing with the original States.

WAS NOT A COMPACT NOR A CONTRACT.

This provision was not a compact or a contract, for the reason that there were no parties thereto capable of making a contract. This was a law passed by Congress in the exercise of its constitutional power to control and regulate part of the territory belonging to the United States. The very first element of a valid contract is that there shall be two or more parties having a legal status and standing on the same ground, so that they may deal with each other in a legal manner. No such condition prevailed here. What that Congress enacted for the control of the government for the Territory of Arizona the very next Congress could have repealed, amended, or modified in any way which seemed to it best. The Congress which created the Territory of Arizona had no authority to bind the next Congress or any succeeding Congress as to the terms and conditions upon which that Territory should be taken into the Union and put on an equal footing with the other States. It was further expressly provided in the act that Congress could change the boundaries of the Territory when and how it deemed proper. There is, therefore, no constitutional inhibition, no legal or moral obligation which can for a moment obstruct the power and right of this Congress to pass the bill which has been reported by your Committee on Territories.

THERE WAS NO "PLEDGE OF STATEHOOD."

The so-called "pledge of statehood," contained in the organic act creating the Territory of Arizona, is coupled with the other provision contained in that act that nothing therein contained shall be considered to prohibit the Congress of the United States from dividing the Territory or changing its boundaries in such manner and at such time as it may deem proper. The expression in favor of statehood was but the expression of a wish that Arizona might some day qualify herself for statehood. It can not fairly be considered a contract, or even a pledge, to the bare handful of less than 10,000 people which inhabited the Territory at that time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DICK. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There were at that time in the Territory of Arizona not 10,000, but about 6,500 people, practically all Mexicans.

CONGRESS HAS FREQUENTLY CHANGED BOUNDARIES OF TERRITORIES.

Mr. DICK. Mr. President, Congress has at all times exercised the right to change the boundaries of Territories when they were admitted as States. The State of Ohio is not the original Territory of Ohio. The boundaries of Kansas differ materially from the boundaries of the Territory of Kansas. The Territory of Washington included the present States of Washington, Idaho, Montana west of the Rocky Mountains, and a portion of Wyoming. When the Territory of Dakota was divided and came into the Union as two States, the claim was advanced that Congress had no power to divide the Territory. The Territory of Iowa, when the first State constitution was formed, embraced a large tract lying north of the present boundaries of the State. Congress did not accept these boundaries and proposed boundaries of its own, which were rejected by the people of Iowa. The present boundaries differ from both those formerly proposed.

ORGANIZATION OF THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

The Territory which it is proposed by this bill to admit into the Union of the States has remained longer in the Territorial condition than any of the land comprised within the United States. The act organizing the Indian Territory was passed June 30, 1834, but no Territorial form of government has ever been provided. The Stars and Stripes have floated over the soil of New Mexico for nearly sixty years, and a form of Territorial government was provided in 1850. At that time only five States had been admitted to the Union west of the Mississippi River, and since 1850 fourteen States have been incorporated within the circle of free and independent Commonwealths.

OVER FIFTY BILLS FOR THE ADMISSION OF NEW MEXICO.

New Mexico, in particular, has knocked long and loud at these doors, asking for admission. Over fifty bills have been introduced in the two Houses looking to that end, and such bills have passed one or both bodies seventeen times. Arizona has been a constant suitor here since 1879.

PASSED BOTH HOUSES IN 1874.

In the Forty-third Congress, in 1874, a bill for the admission of New Mexico passed both Houses by more than three-fourths majority, but was lost in conference. The first political convention held in New Mexico adopted a constitution and elected a Congressman and two Senators to sit in this body, but California was admitted to statehood September 9, 1850, and it was a part of the compromise which brought about that act that New Mexico should remain in a Territorial condition. The first national legislation looking to the admission of new States was the ordinance of 1787, passed by the Congress of the Confederacy at the same time the convention was in session which adopted the Federal Constitution. This ordinance provided a government for the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio River, and declared there should be formed in said territory not less than three nor more than five States. This article concludes as follows:

THE ORDINANCE OF 1787.

And whenever any of the said States shall have 60,000 free inhabitants such State shall be admitted, by its delegates, into the Congress of the United States on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever, and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government: Provided, The constitution and government so to be formed shall be republican and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles, and, so far as it can be consistent with the general interests of the Confederacy, such admission shall be allowed at an earlier period and when there may be a less number of free inhabitants in the State than 60,000.

THE TRUE RULE FOR ADMISSION OF TERRITORIES.

Attention is called to this phrase, "Consistent with the general interests of the Confederacy." That has been the policy of this Government with reference to the admission of new States ever since the passage of that famous statute. As a matter of fact, the first three States admitted from the Northwest Territory came in with a smaller population than 60,000. Ohio, which was admitted in 1803, had, by the census of 1800, only 45,365 people. Indiana, admitted in 1816, had, by the census of 1810, 24,520 poeple.

THE POPULATION HAS GENERALLY EQUALED THE CONGRESSIONAL RATIO.

It is possible that these States at the date of their admission did contain 60,000 people each, but Illinois, admitted in 1818, had, by the census taken two years later, only 55,211. Both Ohio and Illinois, however, at the date of their admission to the Union had a greater population than indicated by the Congressional apportionment, which for the first decade of the nineteenth century was 33,000. This ratio was not increased until 1813, when it was raised to 35,000. It is more than likely that even Indiana at the time of its admission had sufficient population to entitle it to one Congressman under the ratio then obtaining. From that time to the present the general interests of the Union have been the sole test as to whether or not a new member should be admitted into the Union of States. Three States—Vermont, Kentucky, and Tennessee—were admitted in the same century which saw the adoption of our Constitution. Ohio was the first-born child of the nineteenth century. Her territory was pledged to freedom, and slavery was prohibited within its boundaries. The next State to be admitted was Louisiana. The slavery question then became acute, and continued so. The Dred-Scott decision added fuel to the fire. Whenever a free State was admitted a slave State was also taken in as a counterbalance, in order to preserve the equilibrium between freedom and slavery. Thus Indiana, which was admitted in 1816, was followed by Mississippi the next year. Illinois was admitted in 1818 and Alabama the next year. Maine was admitted in 1820 and Missouri in 1821. Arkansas was made a State in 1836 and Michigan in 1837.

THE BALANCE OF SLAVE AND FREE STATES.

The year 1845 saw the admission of two slave States—Florida and Texas—but the balance was soon corrected by the admission of Iowa in 1846 and Wisconsin in 1848. The next State to come in was California in 1850, and that was the result of a compromise which gave statehood to California and denied it to New Mexico. It was no longer possible to maintain the equilibrium between the North and the South, for a magnificent domain remained in the Northwest from which new States could be fashioned, while the territory available for the creation of States where slavery could be maintained was exhausted, although Texas had the right then, as she has to-day, to divide herself into five States—a privilege which it is extremely unlikely will ever be exercised or availed of.

MAINE AND IOWA BROUGHT INTO THE UNION BY PRESSURE.

During this period of our national history the political interests of the North demanded that free States should be added to the Union as fast as slave States, and as a result of these political exigencies Maine and Iowa, at least, were fairly forced into the Union, in both States two or three elections being required before a majority could be mustered to adopt a constitution, and the majority in both cases, when finally obtained, was very small. There can be no question but for the great pressure brought to bear at the time neither of these States would have come into the Union as soon as they did. The test of admission was the general interests of the Union without regard to special interests of the proposed new State.

BIRTH OF WEST VIRGINIA AND NEVADA.

The creation of West Virginia and Nevada may both be said to have been war measures. West Virginia was torn from the bosom of the "Mother of Presidents" with only the slightest pretense of observance of the constitutional provision that no new State shall be erected within the jurisdiction of any other State without the consent of the legislature of the State especially concerned. West Virginia, however, had ample population to justify its creation, for in the first Federal census in which it figured, 1870, it made a showing of 442,014 souls. Nevada, on the contrary, had, by the same census, a population of 42,491, a figure which it did not equal in the last census, when it made a showing of 42,334. Nevada is the only State which has utterly disappointed the hopes and expectations of its early settlers. It has an area of 110,700 square miles, a figure only exceeded by the three States of Texas, California, and Montana, and practically equal to that of Arizona. Recent discoveries of gold have restored to the State some of its former prosperity and its population has largely increased within the past few years, and may even now be double the figure of the last Federal census. The figures of the last census gave to Nevada fewer inhabitants than resided at that time in many of the smaller cities in the United States, and that State has, ever since its admission, served as a warning to Congress against hasty and ill-advised admission of Territories not qualified to take rank with the other States.

THE THIRTEEN ORIGINAL COLONIES FORMED THE UNION.

The thirteen original colonies differed greatly in size and population. It is not a fair argument to compare the new States of the Union, either in area or population, with them. They were never added to the Union, for they made the Union, and but for their coming together in the way they did this Union might not have been created. The first States admitted after the adoption of the Constitution were not larger than the largest of the original States. When the Mississippi River was reached, however, and when new States were taken in west of that river, boundary lines were made more generous and liberal, and the farther west the new States admitted into the Union the larger they were in area.

STEADILY INCREASING SCALE OF REQUIREMENTS.

At the same time, when more square miles have been included in new States, there has been a steady increase in the requirement of population. This increase of requirement of population has fairly approximated the increase of the Congressional apportionment which has determined the number of Members of the lower House of Congress. By the Federal census of 1800, the first taken after the admission of the first three States added to the original thirteen, Vermont had over 150,000, Kentucky over 200,000, and Tennessee over 100,000 population. The Congressional ratio at that time was only 33,000. Louisiana, Mississippi, Illinois, Alabama, Maine, Missouri, Arkansas, Michigan, Florida, Texas, Iowa, Wisconsin, California, Minnesota, every State admitted down to the time Oregon came in, in 1859, had a population equal to the Congressional ratio, either at the time it was admitted or at the next Federal census. Every State admitted since then, except Nevada and Wyoming, has either approximated the Congressional ratio at the time of its admission or since then. With two or three exceptions the history of the Union shows that a steadily increasing scale, both of area and population, has been demanded of new States, and that the rule has been to admit them when it conserved the general interests of the Union to do so. Even the qualifications of area and population have not in every case guaranteed admission, for Utah, on account of polygamy existing in that Territory, was kept out of the circle of statehood long after it had a population equal to the Congressional ratio. The Congressional ratio to-day is, in round numbers, 200,000. The average population of the forty-five States is now over a million and a half.

The best interests of the States of the Union demand that some regard be paid to these figures in admitting new States, and that no new State be admitted which does not fairly compare either in achievement or in probable development with those now forming the Union.

NO OPPOSITION TO THE NEW STATE OF OKLAHOMA.

Hardly a voice will be raised to oppose the admission of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory as a single State. The area comprising the two Territories, with the exception of Beaver County, was a part of the Louisiana purchase. Oklahoma has 38,830 square miles; Indian Territory, 31,000. The new State will have 69,830 square miles. It will be 11,970 square miles smaller than Kansas; 33,815 square miles smaller than Colorado; approximately the same size as Missouri; 14,450 square miles larger than Iowa. Arkansas and Louisiana are smaller. United, it lies in compact form except Beaver County—a long, narrow county extending westwardly on the northern boundary line of Texas to New Mexico.

WONDERFUL DEVELOPMENT OF THAT TERRITORY.

The development of Oklahoma has been without a parallel in the wonderful growth of this country. The first settlement there was made April 22, 1889, when 3,000,000 acres of land purchased from the Creek and Seminole Indians were thrown open to public settlement. The race that was made by eager home seekers the very hour that tract was opened to settlement presented a picture never seen before in this or any other country. Within an hour after the shots were fired which gave the signal for the race to begin every acre of that broad expanse had its claimant. Approximately 100,000 people secured homes. Cities with fifteen to twenty thousand inhabitants were built in a day, and brave and sturdy people immediately commenced the battle of life with the raw and unbroken prairie. The land that had theretofore been the home only of the coyote and the cowboy and the hunting ground for the Indian, at the crack of the pistol was transformed into a habitation for sturdy men and women and their children.

WITHOUT CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR OVER A YEAR.

It was not until a year later, or May 1, 1890, that Congress organized the Territory of Oklahoma and provided a form of government. In that first year the people occupying the Territory governed themselves, proof again of the innate capacity of the American people to maintain law and order and to organize themselves into settled and peaceable communities. They had no law except the statutes of the United States and the common law; they lacked legal authority to organize municipal corporations for the government of cities and towns and to provide by means of taxation for the support of municipal government or the education of their children, and so lived for a year.

The opening of Oklahoma is one of the brightest chapters in American history. The people, by common consent, organized cities and towns, graded the streets, builded schoolhouses, electric-light plants, waterworks, and sewer systems, showing the wonderful adaptability of the American citizen for self-government.

THE ORIGINAL AREA OF OKLAHOMA GREATLY INCREASED.

Following this, the original area of Oklahoma has been increased by the addition in 1890 and the opening to settlement of the Iowa, Sac, Fox, and Pottawatomie Indian reservations, containing 1,283,434 acres, these reservations being in the eastern part of Oklahoma, and the addition in the same year of the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indian reservations, in the western part of Oklahoma, containing 4,297,000 acres.

The strip of land about 37½ miles wide by 167 miles long, which formerly belonged to Texas and was called "No Man's Land," was attached to Oklahoma as Beaver County. September 16, 1893, the Cherokee Strip, 90 miles by 200 in size, containing 6,140,000 acres, was opened to settlement and occupied with a rush. In 1895 the opening to settlement of the Kickapoo Indian Reservation added a tract containing 206,662 acres. In 1896 the addition of Greer County to the Territory of Oklahoma by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, Greer County having theretofore been under the jurisdiction of and claimed by the State of Texas, opened another million and a half acres of land for settlement. In 1901 additional land in the southwestern part of Oklahoma, the Kiowa, Comanche, Apache, and Wichita Indian reservations, comprising an area larger than original Oklahoma, was thrown open to settlement, and as had been the case before, was quickly followed by the birth of busy, thriving towns and the cultivation of nearly every acre of land.

Within the present limits of Oklahoma there are still reserved from settlement the Osage, Ponca, and Otoe Indian reservations and the Kiowa and Comanche pasture reservation, approximately two and one-half million acres; but these Indian reservations, under acts of Congress, have been very largely leased to white men for agricultural purposes, and a very large portion are under cultivation as producing farms.

POPULATION.

By the census of 1900 Oklahoma had a population of over 398,000. Since that time the Kiowa, Comanche, Apache, and Wichita Indian reservations have been opened to settlement, comprising three large and populous counties, with three wonderfully prosperous young cities and an aggregate population of at least 150,000, and the governor of the Territory, in his last annual report to the Secretary of the Interior, estimates the population of the Territory of Oklahoma on the 30th day of June last at 800,000 people. The recent census taken of the children of school age shows a school population of the Territory between the ages of 5 and 21 years of over 211,000, which would ordinarily indicate under the usual rules a population largely in excess of 800,000. The inhabitants of foreign birth do not equal 4 per cent.

The last annual report of the governor of Oklahoma, dated September 15, 1905, furnishes ample proof of the readiness of Oklahoma to accept the privileges and burdens of statehood.

VARIED AGRICULTURAL RESOURCES.

The wealth of Oklahoma depends largely upon agriculture, almost every acre being fitted for cultivation. There is not a State in the Union which surpasses Oklahoma in the diversity of its crops. It raises with equal success the staple crops of the North and of the South. The same fields which have furnished a rich harvest of wheat have, the same year, been sown to cotton and furnished a rich return upon that investment. Cotton now rivals wheat and corn in value. The last cotton crop was almost double the value of the wheat crop of 1904 and it promised to far outdo the wheat crop of 1905. The output was over 400,000 bales. The corn crop last year exceeded 50,000,000 bushels. Wheat is raised in Oklahoma with success. Kaffir corn is grown extensively, alfalfa and cowpeas yield better returns than clover and enrich the soil much better. Bermuda grass, broom corn, and castor beans are among the staple crops.

FIGURES OF AGRICULTURAL WEALTH.

The 23,000,000 acres of land in Oklahoma represent an agricultural investment, exclusive of improvements, crops, or stock, of $232,000,000. Adding to this the value of implements, machinery, and live stock makes the total $319,780,903 as the figure of agricultural wealth of the Territory. All kinds of fruits are raised successfully there, and in some varieties the Territory rivals the world. The total assessed valuation of the Territory for 1905 was $93,130,721, which is about one-fifth the real value. In 1901 the total assessment was a little over $60,000,000, and in 1902 increased to $75,000,000. These figures show a steady and substantial growth. Farm property increased in assessed value from 1904 to 1905 from $30,000,000 to $33,000,000. In recent years there has been developed a gas and oil field that rivals the great State of Pennsylvania, with coal and manganese and asphalt beds and gypsum beds; granite quarries rivaling the great State of Vermont, and a magnificent magnesium limestone rivaling the wonderful quarries of New Bedford, Ind.

RAILROAD MILEAGE AND OTHER STATISTICS.

The railroad mileage in the Territory has moved forward by leaps and bounds, and there are over 3,000 miles of track, exclusive of siding and right of way in the Territory. The year ending June 30, 1905, added 432.71 miles in new mileage. There are over 12,000 miles of toll line and telephone wires in the two Territories. The newspapers published number 345, including 30 dailies. There is an excellent State university, with buildings and grounds worth about $250,000; a university preparatory school and three State normal schools; an agricultural and mechanical college, representing $250,000, and a colored agricultural and normal school, all supported more or less by the Territory. The total number of banks in the Territory, which reported to the bank commissioner, was 262 Territorial banks and 85 national banks. During the past year only one Territorial bank and one national bank failed, and in neither case was a dollar lost to the depositors.

The railroads are assessed for taxation on their main lines from $5,600 per mile down to $5,000 per mile, and less amounts on the more unimportant lines and the various side tracks and branches.

OKLAHOMA HAS NO BONDED DEBT.

The Territory has no bonded debt. November 30, 1905, it had an outstanding warrant indebtedness of $735,240. On the same date the Territorial treasurer had on hand $710,842 cash, and the school land leasing board had on hand $259,317, rentals of leased lands not yet turned over to the Treasurer, leaving cash on hand over and above all indebtedness of $234,920.05. At this date practically none of the Territorial taxes for the year 1905 had been collected, as they did not become payable until December 1 and delinquent until the 15th day of January under the law.

A MAGNIFICENT EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENT.

The Territory has 1,413,704 acres of land reserved by acts of Congress for the support of the common schools of the new State, which is confirmed to the State by this act as a grant.

It has 322,006 acres of land reserved for agricultural and mechanical college, university and normal school purposes, which reservations are confirmed to the State in this act.

It has 315,165 acres reserved for public buildings and the erection of charitable and penal institutions, which reservation is confirmed by this act to the new State as a grant. It has also cash on hand in the treasury, $438,406, accumulation of rentals of the lands reserved for public building purposes, which it has not been authorized to expend and the accumulating rentals of which are being held by the Territory for the use of the new State in furtherance of the purposes for which the land was reserved and granted. It is confidently believed that if these lands could be retained by the State, the rentals of the same would pay the interest on a sufficient amount of bonds to build all of the State institutions which must necessarily be located when Oklahoma becomes a State.

By this act Congress has made a grant for common school purposes to the new State of $5,000,000 in lieu of sections 16 and 36 granted in Oklahoma, and which under the conditions in the Indian Territory are unavailable, there being no public lands in the Indian Territory subject to such grant.

The bill also provides for grants of public lands to the various educational institutions in the Territory aggregating 1,050,000 acres, in addition to the grants of land for the purposes heretofore mentioned. There is in the Territory available for the satisfaction of these grants approximately 1,600,000 acres of unappropriated public land.

The present population of Oklahoma is about twenty to a square mile as against about one to the square mile in Arizona and New Mexico.

LAND ENTERED FOR SETTLEMENT IN 1905.

In the year ending June 30, 1905, 477,000 acres were entered for settlement in Woodward and Beaver counties, in the extreme northwest of Oklahoma. It is claimed that the percentage of householders owning their own homes is greater than in any other State in the Union except three, and that no State shows such a high percentage of homes entirely free from debt.

SMALL PERCENTAGE OF ILLITERACY.

The percentage of illiteracy in the population over 10 years of age is 5.5 per cent, the same as in New York State, and slightly less than in Massachusetts, as compared to 33 per cent of all the population in New Mexico and 34 per cent in Arizona. There are thirty-one States having a greater degree of illiteracy than Oklahoma. The percentage of illiteracy among the whites is less than 3 per cent, but among the blacks it is 26 per cent, and this raises the total average.

IRRIGATION NEEDED IN WESTERN PART.

The extreme western part of the Territory needs irrigation, and Oklahoma has now over $3,000,000 to her credit in the National Treasury which can be utilized for that purpose. Irrigation projects now being carried on will add many acres to the cultivable land of the Territory.

POST-OFFICES AND RURAL FREE DELIVERY ROUTES.

There are over 900 post-offices, and 7 towns had postal receipts for the last fiscal year exceeding $10,000, thus entitling them to free mail delivery. There are nearly 700 rural free-delivery routes.

STATEMENT OF HON. DENNIS T. FLYNN.

The following statement, made before the Senate Committee on Territories in June, 1902, by Hon. Dennis T. Flynn, then Delegate from the Territory of Oklahoma, puts in a nutshell the splendid development and high standing of the Territory. He said:

> We have less illiteracy than there is in any State in the Union. We have more newspapers in proportion to our population, two to one, than you have in any State of the Union. We have more banks in proportion to our population than you have in any other section of the Union. You can not go into a home in Oklahoma where you will not find one or two weekly newspapers and possibly one daily paper taken. We have increased in our banking strength; we have increased the number of our common schools; we have increased everything the men of Oklahoma have applied their hands to. There is not a poor-house in the Territory of Oklahoma. There is not a penitentiary in the Territory of Oklahoma. We do not need those things.

ALL PUBLIC BONDS SELL AT A PREMIUM.

He testifies that the municipal and county bonds issued in the Territory sold in the market at a premium at 4 per cent, a lower rate of interest than has been enjoyed by any Territory in the history of the United States. There is no place in our country to-day where so many different crops can be raised as Oklahoma raises on the same piece of land. Mr. Flynn further states that the farmer in Oklahoma can till the soil eleven months out of the twelve and does not have to put up feed for the winter.

A wonderful development and a grand people, who, since 1892, with a sufficient population and sufficient resources to entitle them to admission, have been pleading with Congress for statehood and for the opportunity for self-government.

JOINT STATEHOOD AGREEABLE TO OKLAHOMA AND INDIAN TERRITORY.

The one great question that has stood in the way of the admission of Oklahoma to statehood has been the determination on the part of the Congress to unite the fortunes of Oklahoma with the Indian Territory, and in the wisdom of this determination of Congress all the people of Oklahoma and practically all the people of the Indian Territory have acquiesced, and they come here again, united now and with practically no dissenting voice, requesting of this Congress the boon of statehood.

POPULATION AND AREA OF INDIAN TERRITORY.

The Indian Territory, with an estimated population of 750,000 people, has an area of 31,000 square miles. It has been since 1866 the home of the Five Civilized Tribes—the Cherokees, the Creeks, the Choctaws, the Chickasaws, and the Seminoles—the most intelligent and civilized Indians in all the country.

INDIAN TRIBAL GOVERNMENTS.

They have erected and maintained governments of their own. They passed laws for the government of their people and these laws were printed in statute form. They elected their governors and their legislators and their other tribal officers, patterning after, in the forms of their government, the government of the States of the Union. They held their lands in common. This vast domain of 31,000 square miles was the home of a handful of Indians. The Dawes Commission, in one of its reports, estimated the number of Indians—white, red, and black—entitled to participate in tribal government and tribal lands at approximately 90,000. This included the tribes that adopted their slaves after the civil war as members of their tribe. It included the adopted white citizens; it included the children of intermarried Indians with white and colored people, and at the same time the Dawes Commission estimated the total number of full bloods in the Indian Territory at approximately 24,000. The Indian Territory was settled earlier than Oklahoma. There are portions of the Indian Territory that have been cultivated for over sixty years, notably the rich and fertile valley of the Washita River, known as "Pauls Valley."

WHITE MEN INVITED TO THE TERRITORY.

The leaders and molders of sentiment amongst the Indians, actuated by the same motives that actuate and prompt the white man for gain, by a system of permit laws and a system of leasing lands, years ago invited the white man into the Indian Territory to break up the virgin soil and convert it into producing farms and homes and to build cities, and thereupon the great question that has agitated Congress for many years, relating to intruders in that country, became a burning issue. But those intruders were in fact invited into the country by the Indians themselves, and are responsible for the wonderful growth and development of that country and for the fact that to-day there are 750,000 people living within the boundaries of that Territory. The attitude of the Government of the United States toward these people, its own citizens, has been one of neglect. The Government has carefully looked after the education, care, and protection of the Indian. In this the Government was right; but there, living in that country, was a considerable number of citizens, steadily growing to the present population, which until within the past few years had no possible means of educating their children, and only now in all that country are the citizens of the United States permitted to maintain governments and to raise taxes to educate their children in the cities and towns.

TRIBAL GOVERNMENTS EXPIRE MARCH 4, 1906.

The Indian Territory has no government except the government of the courts and the government provided by act of Congress for cities and towns, except the tribal government, which expires March 4 next.

SOME FORM OF GOVERNMENT NEEDED IMMEDIATELY.

There is in that country at least 400,000 rural population without government, without means of education for the children, and it is time that these conditions were changed. They are American citizens. They have united with Oklahoma in asking for statehood, and surely and certainly it ought to be granted. Let them organize their county and municipal governments, give them an opportunity to organize school districts and to educate their children, give them an opportunity to participate in self-government, to which every American citizen who loves the flag aspires.

INDUCEMENTS TO IMMIGRATION TO INDIAN TERRITORY.

Under the legislation of Congress the Indians in the Indian Territory have all taken their lands in severalty, and, outside of the provision for the retention of homesteads, are given limited rights of alienation, which, together with the town-site acts, for the first time open to the white man the right to obtain the ownership of lands in the Indian Territory, and now we may reasonably expect after this bill is passed a wonderful immigration into that country. The young men from Ohio and Indiana, Illinois and Iowa, and all the other great States of the Union will go there to cast their fortunes with the people of this magnificent Commonwealth, and to make the citizenship of that new State unexcelled by the citizenship of any other State in the Union. The development of the Indian Territory has in some respects been even more remarkable than the development of Oklahoma, for the reason that the land all belonged to the Indians and none of it was ever thrown open to the public for settlement, no counties have been organized, and no Territorial form of government has been provided, so that the development has been in towns and cities. But little of the land has been farmed, but there is much river bottom land which is equal to the very best corn, wheat, and cotton land in the United States. It is claimed for the Indian Territory that its cotton is rated as the best and that its yield per acre exceeds that of any other State. The last cotton crop of which I am able to find record was 282,338 bales, worth $14,000,000. While Oklahoma is almost entirely an agricultural Territory, the Indian Territory is rich in mineral deposits. For the year ending June 30, 1905, nearly 3,000,000 tons of coal were produced and fourteen new mines were opened, and 109 are now in operation. The coal deposits in the Indian Territory are claimed to be as extensive as those of Pennsylvania, and iron, zinc, lead, and granite and limestone are found in almost inexhaustible quantities.

ONLY SELF-GOVERNMENT FOUND IN THE TOWNS.

There are some incorporated towns in the Territory in which the people have the privilege of self-government, but otherwise this great body of people is governed entirely by Congress and the Interior Department. While the percentage of illiteracy in the Indian Territory is higher than in Oklahoma, the percentage of illiteracy among the males of voting age is 15.9.

There are 142 papers published, of which 19 are daily papers. There are over 600 post-offices, of which five had, during the past fiscal year, receipts in excess of $10,000. The total railroad mileage is placed at 2,403 miles.

The taxable values of the Territory are considered to aggregate between sixty and seventy million dollars.

RANK OF THE NEW STATE OF OKLAHOMA.

These two Territories have wonderful possibilities for development based upon wonderful resources. United they will make a State having an area of 70,000 square miles and a population of one and one-half millions of people, which is nearly equal to the average of the forty-five States now composing the Federal Union, and a greater population than that of twenty-three of the States represented in this body. Lying on the border line between the North and the South, they have a varied agricultural production that promises a great future. The Indian Territory, with its wonderful coal mines and railroads and cities and rich farming lands, in time may be expected to even outstrip Oklahoma in the aggregate value of its property.

RAPID GROWTH IN POPULATION AND PRODUCTS.

New population is pouring into the proposed State at a rapid rate to take advantage of its agricultural and mineral opportunities. Twenty thousand homesteaders settled last year in Oklahoma. The combined agricultural products of the two Territories for the past year are estimated at nearly 100,000,000 bushels of corn, 10,000,000 bushels of oats, over 28,000,000 bushels of wheat, and 681,813 bales of cotton.

The railroad mileage in the two Territories aggregates 5,500 miles and the taxable valuation $250,000,000.

SENTIMENT FOR JOINT STATEHOOD ALMOST UNANIMOUS.

The substantially unanimous sentiment of the people of these two Territories is for joint statehood. That has been the better sentiment of the people of Oklahoma from the beginning. On March 9, 1899, Hon. C. M. Barnes, then governor of Oklahoma, vetoed a bill providing for a constitutional convention looking toward statehood for Oklahoma. That message is so admirable and presents such cogent reasons in favor of the union of these two Territories, although it bears date nearly seven years ago, that I take the liberty of reproducing it here, and will ask the Secretary to read it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

GOVERNOR BARNES'S VETO MESSAGE.

GUTHRIE, OKLA., March 9, 1899.

To the honorable council, fifth legislative assembly.

GENTLEMEN: I believe that the people of Oklahoma desire statehood in the American Union, because it is the highest and best form of free government known to the children of men, and I am in hearty sympathy with this desire and purpose, but I do not believe, all things considered, that the enactment of this bill into a law would advance the interests of Oklahoma toward the fruition of our hopes one iota. No sincere man will for a moment contest the statement that a State government would be much more expensive to maintain than is our present Territorial government. The expenses of a State government must be borne by taxation of the property of the people, and the people of Oklahoma who pay the taxes are not in condition, nor do they wish, to assume any additional burden of that character. It is true that our people have been generally prosperous for the past few years, but it is as well for those who have in keeping the welfare of the State, as it is for the individual, to consider carefully the results of any proposed enterprise before taking a step that will incur additional obligations and increased assessments to meet them. We should not forget that Oklahoma is in some respects as yet an experiment. We might have a recurrence of the dry seasons of 1894 and 1895. The recent action of Congress refusing to ratify treaties with the Cherokees and Creeks pledging the United States to a policy of continued separation of the two Territories, is significant to the thoughtful mind and indicates a well-settled and determined purpose in the minds of Senators and Representatives never to admit Oklahoma and the Indian Territory as two States. And I feel sure that the ultimate destiny of the two Territories is that of single statehood. This being true, to hold a constitutional convention at this time to form a constitution for Oklahoma upon the lines laid down in this bill would not advance the matter in the slightest degree, but, on the contrary, would retard and hinder the growth of a healthful political sentiment in the Indian Territory in favor of such a union. With the Indian Territory incorporated with Oklahoma in one State we would place a star upon the flag of our country whose luster would not be dimmed by the constellation of magnificent States by which we are surrounded. Our varied resources of timber, mineral, agricultural, and grazing land would forever furnish the necessary supplies to pay the expenses of a first-class State government, and enable us to build and maintain penal, reformatory, and eleemosynary institutions that would compare favorably with those of the most advanced and progressive people, and all without the people, who must always pay the taxes for the support of the government, feeling in the slightest degree the burden of excessive demand by the taxgatherers. On the other hand, Oklahoma, with her resources restricted to agriculture and the raising of cattle, without the hope even of development of coal or other minerals in paying quantities, or the development of manufacturing industries, would be but a weak and feeble Commonwealth in the great sisterhood of States. We have never, as yet, raised a revenue in any one year sufficient to pay the running expenses of our Territorial government, and a casual deficit has been steadily increasing year by year. By reason of the Federal limitations upon our debt-creating power, and by reason of a careful and economical administration of Territorial laws, aided in no small degree by the General Government, which pays a large share of our governmental expenses, we have been able to maintain the credit and good name of our Territory. Our taxable valuation, placed last year at about forty millions, was the subject of much criticism by the people, and the very first bill passed by the honorable House of Representatives of your honorable body was to reduce said valuation to $32,000,000. I assume, therefore, that the people do not wish to incur the expenses of two special elections and of holding a constitutional convention without better prospects of ameliorating the condition of affairs than this measure seems to offer. I therefore feel constrained to return council bill No. 47, being "An act providing for the formation of a constitution."

THE TWO TERRITORIES TO HAVE THE SAME NUMBER OF CONSTITUTIONAL DELEGATES.

Mr. DICK. Mr. President, the pending bill provides for a constitutional convention, to be composed of 110 delegates—55 delegates from Oklahoma and 55 delegates from the Indian Territory. The Indian Territory is to be divided into districts for the election of these delegates by the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes and two judges of the United States courts for the Indian Territory. The former represents the Indians and the judges are the officers of the Government of the United States in that Territory. They have afforded practically all the government the people have had, and they are well acquainted with the conditions and the population. They are men of high character and integrity, who will do justice. In Oklahoma the districts will be formed by the governor, the secretary, and the chief justice of that Territory. By reason of the fact that there are no election laws in the Indian Territory the election laws of Oklahoma so far as applicable, together with the penal laws of the Territory of Oklahoma relating to illegal voting, are extended over the Indian Territory for the conduct of the elections provided for by this act. The result shall be ascertained and the votes canvassed by the judge senior in service in the Indian Territory and the governor and secretary of the Territory of Oklahoma.

No one can reasonably doubt or question for one moment the ability of these two Territories to form a constitution, republican in form and in harmony with the Constitution and laws of the United States, and to maintain the government so formed.

TWO JUDICIAL DISTRICTS AND FIVE CONGRESSMEN.

The bill provides for two judicial districts and the appointment of two district judges of the United States, the Indian Territory forming one district and the Oklahoma Territory forming one district. The bill provides for five Members of Congress and divides the Territory into the same number of Congressional districts.

If the State of Oklahoma at the time of its admission contains a million and a half people, as is confidently asserted, and as I believe, the State of Oklahoma would be entitled to seven Members of the lower House of Congress.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

The bill provides that the constitutional convention may arrange for the election of a full complement of State officers and a legislative assembly, and the legislative assembly is directed to elect Senators to the United States Senate.

TERRITORIAL CONDITION NO BAR TO GROWTH.

The marvelous development of these two Territories—one of which was opened to settlement less than seventeen years ago, while the other has for over seventy years been entirely without any organized government provided by Congress—shows conclusively that the Territorial condition is not an insuperable bar to marvelous growth and development. Where the opportunities are the best and the natural advantages promise rich return for investment, there the American people will flock in large numbers and will till the soil, build towns and cities, and will provide all the necessary instruments for the highest American advancement. In view of the splendid progress that has been made in Oklahoma, it may well be doubted whether any greater advancement could have been made had statehood been granted when it was first asked for ten years ago. Certain it is that no fair argument can be made against the immediate admission of these two Territories as one State.

Mr. President, if agreeable to the pleasure of the Senate, I will, at this point, suspend my remarks and ask to resume them again at the next meeting of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio? The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I see no special necessity that the Senate should be in session to-morrow, unless it is for the consideration of the statehood bill. If that measure is not to be pressed to-morrow, I will move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

RETURN OF RECORDS TO NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 26) providing for the return of certain archives now in possession of the Department of State to the State of North Carolina, which was introduced by myself some time since, referred to the Committee on the Library, and reported favorably this morning.

Mr. SPOONER. I desire to hear it read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to withdraw from the files of the Department of State and deliver to the State of North Carolina certain legislative papers, correspondence, and other material appertaining to the records of said State and not needed for the use of the Department of State.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPOONER. I move to amend the joint resolution by striking out all after the words "North Carolina," in the fifth line, and inserting the following:

Purely "State archives," bearing dates from 1750 to 1800, with a few of a later date, and including copies of letters from the Delegates to the Continental Congress, State militia papers, papers relating to the rebuilding of the State capitol, and papers of a like local character: Provided, That no papers commonly called "Confederate archives," or any original papers belonging to the records of the Continental Congress, or needed for the uses of the Government shall be delivered under the provisions hereof to said State.

Mr. SIMMONS. That amendment is satisfactory to me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I could not understand from the reading of the amendment its intent. I do think that the withdrawal of original archives in the Departments at Washington ought to go no further. If we withdraw and give to any State or any municipality the original archives, in a little time the only one place to which resort can be had for investigation of a historic nature will disappear. The one place where all of these archives ought to be, and ought to be kept, is Washington, in the different Departments here. I do not object to copies being made and given to States or municipalities.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I interrupt the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree with what the Senator says as to the archives of the Government, but I understand that these are not of that character. I understand that they are archives of North Carolina that were brought here toward the end of the war; that they are the archives of North Carolina, and are held here really in trust for the State. They are not original papers filed with the Department.

Mr. HALE. I am not so certain that they are held in trust for the State. I am not certain but that these very original papers that are here ought to remain here. It was one of the results and one of the processes that followed the winding up of the war that certain documents were brought here and have been kept here ever since. I should not be willing because of that now to restore all of them. Some of these documents are very valuable, and will be hereafter, not simply to the State, but, as I have said, to the lover and the student of historic research.

I can not agree now that the joint resolution shall pass, if it covers the removal from Washington of any original papers, until I examine it further.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him just one minute?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. These are purely local papers pertaining to matters that are North Carolina matters. They were brought here, as my colleague stated, just at the close of the war as the result of seizure made by the Feberal troops when occupying the capital of my State.

Mr. HALE. I so understand.

Mr. SIMMONS. I inquired at the State Department before introducing the joint resolution as to whether these papers were of any service or use to the Government, and I was advised that they were not.

Mr. HALE. They may not be at present, but they may be very valuable hereafter.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to state further to the Senator that we want them at present because they will be of very great use to us in compiling our records. We are doing that now under an act of our legislature through the chief justice of the State, and he has been held in this work by reason of not having these particular papers.

Mr. HALE. Copies of them would answer that purpose as well as the originals.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator from Maine will permit me a moment, I think he will not insist upon his objection when he understands the precise situation as disclosed by a letter from the Secretary of State. I objected to the passage of the joint resolution the other day because of the want of accurate description of the papers which were to be covered by it and surrendered to the State.

In the first place, no papers which originally were a part of the files of the State Department or of any other Department of the Government are to be surrendered to the State of North Carolina under the joint resolution. The papers which the joint resolution covers are papers which were State archives of North Carolina, and were seized by our Army along toward the end of the war, with rebellion records and archives of various descriptions, and deposited in that way in the Department of State.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator a question right there. Does the letter from the Secretary of State which he has indicate the specific papers that are sought to be returned?

Mr. SPOONER. I was about to state to the Senate that the matter was referred, as it was agreed it should be when it was up before, to the State Department, and the Secretary of State wrote this letter to the Hon. GEORGE PEABODY WETMORE, chairman of the Committee on the Library:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 8, 1906.

Hon. GEORGE PEABODY WETMORE,
Chairman Committee on the Library,
United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 6th instant, inclosing a copy of joint resolution No. 26, providing for the return of certain North Carolina archives now in the possession of this Department and asking the opinion of the Department relative to its passage.

In reply I have to inform you that the papers in question are purely "State archives"— bearing dates from 1750 to 1800, with a few of a later date, and including copies of letters from the Delegates to the Continental Congress, State militia papers, papers relating to the rebuilding of the State capitol, and papers of a like local character, but do not contain what are commonly called "Confederate archives," nor any original papers belonging to the records of the Continental Congress.

Quoted—

The Secretary of State says further:

The resolution as introduced follows the precedent already established by the Department relative to the surrender of its papers, and protects the Department in that it is discretionary with the Secretary of State as to what papers are "not needed for the use of the Department of State."

That phrase is in the joint resolution.

I am therefore of the opinion that the resolution should be passed in its present form.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

ELIHU ROOT.

I have proposed to amend——

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator read that part to which my objection applied, that it does not cover any Confederate archives? I am not certain whether that is in the Secretary's letter.

Mr. SPOONER (reading)—

That no papers commonly called "Confederate archives," or any original papers belonging to the records of the Continental Congress or needed for the uses of the Government shall be, under the provisions of this joint resolution, returned to North Carolina.

Mr. HALE. I do not think what are known as "Confederate archives" ought to be given up by the State Department.

Mr. SPOONER. That is what I contended the other day.

Mr. HALE. That seems to be covered.

Mr. SPOONER. It is excluded specifically.

Mr. HALE. Now, let us hear the Senator's amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. The joint resolution will read as follows, as I propose to amend it:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to withdraw from the files of the Department of State and deliver to the State of North Carolina purely "State archives," bearing dates from 1750 to 1800, with a few of a later date, and including copies of letters from the Delegates to the Continental Congress, State militia papers, papers relating to the rebuilding of the State capitol, and papers of a like local character: Provided, That no papers commonly called "Confederate archives," or any original papers belonging to the records of the Continental Congress, or needed for the uses of the Government shall be delivered, under the provisions hereof, to said State.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator has covered that with his amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to state that North Carolina has very valuable colonial records. We have already published twenty-six volumes of those records, and we wish to publish all documents bearing on the colonial days. We are very proud of them.

Mr. SPOONER. I would say to the Senator that objection has been withdrawn to the joint resolution.

Mr. HALE. I think the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is very well guarded, indeed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 5, after the name "North Carolina," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the joint resolution, as follows:

Certain legislative papers, correspondence, and other material appertaining to the records of said State and not needed for the use of the Department of State.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

Purely "State archives," bearing dates from 1750 to 1800, with a few of a later date, and including copies of letters from the Delegates to the Continental Congress, State militia papers, papers relating to the rebuilding of the State capitol, and papers of a like local character: Provided, That no papers commonly called "Confederate archives," or any original papers belonging to the records of the Continental Congress, or needed for the uses of the Government shall be delivered, under the provisions hereof, to said State.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator withdraw the motion for a moment in order that I may give a notice?

Mr. KEAN. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. HEYBURN. Inasmuch as the Senate has concluded to adjourn over until Monday, I desire at this time to give notice that on Monday, after the conclusion of the routine morning business, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 88, being what is known as the "pure-food bill," for the purpose of the introduction of amendments and their consideration, and I shall ask the Senate to devote the remainder of the morning hour to the consideration of that bill. I should like to have such amendments as are to be offered introduced at as early a time as possible, so that they may be thoroughly considered before the time fixed for the taking of the vote.

Mr. SPOONER. May I ask the Senator if there has been a reprint of the bill as amended up to this date?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; there has been such a reprint.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 19, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

TOBACCO.

Mr. DALZELL, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. 14972) for the relief of tobacco growers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LOST CHECKS.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4) to amend section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by act of February 16, 1885.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by act of February 16, 1885, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3646. Whenever any original check is lost, stolen, or destroyed, disbursing officers and agents of the United States are authorized, after the expiration of six months and within three years from the date of such check, to issue a duplicate check; and the Treasurer, assistant treasurers, and designated depositaries of the United States are directed to pay such duplicate checks upon notice and proof of the loss of the original checks under such regulations in regard to their issue and payment, and upon the execution of such bonds, with securities, to indemnify the United States, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania for some explanation of the bill.

Mr. DALZELL. This identical bill passed the last House. It is reported now unanimously by the Committee on the Judiciary. Under existing law, if a check is lost, and it exceeds twenty-five hundred dollars, a duplicate can not be issued except by special act of Congress. There is no reason in the world for that. This authorizes the Secretary to issue duplicate checks, when they are in excess of twenty-five hundred dollars.

Mr. SULZER. As I understand it, for any amount under twenty-five hundred dollars it can be done now without a special act of Congress?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. This simply changes the law and makes it general, to cover all amounts over or under twenty-five hundred dollars?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes; upon such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe.

Mr. SULZER. I think that is right.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The Secretary is the man who issues the check now?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DALZELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles:

H. R. 13568. An act to authorize the Campbell Lumber Company to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River, in Clay County, Ark., at or near the point where the section line between sections 2326, in township 20 north, range 9 east, touches said river; and

H. R. 13567. An act to authorize the Campbell Lumber Company to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River, in Clay County, Ark., at or near the point where the section line between sections 21 and 28, township 19 north, range 9 east, touches said river.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

S. R. 23. Joint resolution providing for an extension of time for completing the highway bridge and approaches across the Potomac River, at Washington, D. C.; and

S. 2106. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at or near Van Buren, Ark.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4198. An act granting permission to Prof. Simon Newcomb, United States Navy, retired, to accept the decoration of the order "Pour le Mérite, für Wissenschaften und Kunste;" and

S. 529. An act to promote the national defense, to create a naval reserve, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, and to promote commerce.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 529. An act to promote the national defense, to create a naval reserve, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, and to promote commerce—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

S. 4198. An act granting permission to Prof. Simon Newcomb, United States Navy, retired, to accept the decoration of the order "Pour le Mérite, für Wissenschaften und Kunste"—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SEAL FOR UNITED STATES COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7) to provide a seal for United States commissioners.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That each United States commissioner shall provide himself with an official impression seal, to be prescribed by the Attorney-General, which said seal shall be affixed to each jurat or certificate of the official acts of said commissioner, but no increase of fees shall be allowed by reason thereof.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is this bill?

Mr. DALZELL. This bill also passed the last House, and is reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. United States commissioners now have no seal. It very often happens that they take depositions to be used in States where a seal is required for their verification, and this authorizes them to use a seal.

Mr. SULZER. Without charging any additional fee?

Mr. DALZELL. Without charging any additional fee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DALZELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REORGANIZATION OF CUSTOMS COLLECTION DISTRICTS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14606) to provide for the consolidation and reorganization of customs collection districts, and for other purposes.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I rise for the purpose of obtaining, in the first place, debate upon this question——

Mr. PAYNE. I was about to suggest that.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. On the question why the House should not resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PAYNE. That can not be done, of course, but I should like to make some arrangement now for general debate on the bill. I want liberal debate in the committee. If any gentleman who opposes the bill is prepared to suggest any reasonable time, I should like to agree upon it. I should like to dispose of it to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York that we let general debate go on for the present. I am not able even primarily to settle in my own mind how much time would be desired on this side.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course, it can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I want to be clearly understood about this matter.

Mr. PAYNE. Regular order!

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I ask the House to vote down the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I am asking unanimous consent that we debate the proposition.

Mr. PAYNE. I demand the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Then, I ask that the House vote down the motion.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Tellers, Mr. Speaker.

Tellers were ordered.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS].

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 65, noes 90.

Mr. PAYNE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 87, nays 163, answered "present" 6, not voting 128, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote and to lay that motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER. It occurs to the Chair that that motion is not in order. In the opinion of the Chair it is like unto a motion to adjourn. The Chair reads from the House precedents:

The Speaker decided that a motion to adjourn might not be reconsidered——

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I shall withdraw that motion and move to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House; it is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the gentlman need not be worried; the bill will come up some other day. [Laughter.] The House will understand it finally, and he need not be worried about it.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Oh, I am not worried at all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his motion to reconsider?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I do. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] give us notice when this bill is coming up again?

Mr. PAYNE. I shall give no notice. I will get it up when I think the time is proper, and in the meantime I shall try to get the facts before the House and let gentlemen know what they are voting upon.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The Clerk will call the committees. The call lies with the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of committees.

REGISTRY OF REPAIRED FOREIGN WRECKS.

Mr. GROSVENOR (when the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 1007) to repeal section 4136 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the admission to registry of repaired foreign wrecks, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4136 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, reading as follows: "The Commissioner of Navigation may issue a register or enrollment for any vessel built in a foreign country, whenever such vessel shall be wrecked in the United States, and shall be purchased and repaired by a citizen of the United States, if it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioner that the repairs put upon such vessel are equal to three-fourths of the cost of the vessel when so repaired," is hereby repealed.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some explanation about this bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, this is a Senate bill and comes to the House of Representatives with a unanimous report from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The proposition in the bill is as follows: Under the existing law there are some four or five subdivisions or sections of the law by which foreign and wrecked ships may be admitted to American registry. One of the provisions is that the Department of Commerce and Labor on its own motion may have that jurisdiction, and at the request of the Department, and upon unanimous report of the Senate committee and of the House committee, we introduced this bill repealing the single section of the old law that confers upon the Bureau the power to admit to American registry one of these reconstructed ships. That is all there is of the bill. I have in my hand, if gentlemen desire to know it, a long list of ships that have thus been admitted to registry without any action of Congress, upon the mere ex parte hearing of a bureau officer of the Treasury Department heretofore and now of the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, there has been so much confusion that I have not heard distinctly what the gentleman from Ohio said. I would like to know whether this bill proposes to repeal the entire law that allowed a wrecked ship to be rebuilt and have American registry.

Mr. GROSVENOR. On the contrary, it leaves the present law exactly as it is, so that under three subdivisions of the law the registry may be had, but it repeals simply so much of the law as authorized the Bureau of Commerce and Labor, without any hearing by Congress or anybody else, to admit these wrecks to registry.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Who does permit a wrecked ship, rebuilt, to registry?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It retains all that we have acted under; simply repeals that which seems to have furnished a great deal of abuse in the Department, and it is recommended by all the Departments of the Government.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Do I understand that if we pass this bill, for a wrecked ship to get American registry it has to come to Congress?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It has to come to Congress, as it does now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not understand that it does now. I understand that the Department of Commerce and Labor, if three-fourths of the ship is new and built in America, can give it American registry.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And it simply proposed on their own recommendation that that power be taken from them, but all the other rights and privileges are retained in the law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But there will be no rights and privileges left.

Mr. GROSVENOR. They are all left except that one privilege.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the privilege of American registry?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; I have stated that there are four ways that a ship can get American registry, and this takes away only one of them and leaves all the others exactly as they are now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There was so much confusion I could not hear the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There has been no opposition to this bill either in the Senate or in the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me ask the gentleman, so I can understand the proposition, if 75 per cent of a wrecked vessel is rebuilt in this country, can that ship obtain an American registry under the present law without the consent of Congress?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; it can not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I understood it would.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I will have this report on the Senate bill read if the House desires to hear it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that is a good idea.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read in the time of the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1007) to repeal section 4136 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the admission to registry of repaired foreign wrecks, having considered the same, make a unanimous report in favor of the passage of the bill without amendment.

The bill has the approval of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and we have adopted the entire Senate report as giving full information in regard to the propriety of passing the bill and the necessity of its passage. It is believed that it is not desirable that the power heretofore vested in the Commissioner of Navigation by section 4136 of the Revised Statutes ought longer to rest in that officer, and so we report the bill back with the foregoing recommendation.

[Senate Report No. 114, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1007) to repeal section 4136 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the admission to registry of repaired foreign wrecks, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass without amendment.

The bill has the approval of the Department of Commerce and Labor, as will appear by the following letter and extracts from the report of the Commissioner of Navigation, which present the facts and considerations actuating the committee:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, December 14, 1905.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 12th instant, transmitting S. 1007, a bill to repeal section 4136 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the admission to registry of repaired foreign wrecks, and requesting me to furnish the committee with such suggestions as I may deem proper touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage.

Section 4136 of the Revised Statutes embodies the provisions of the act of December 23, 1852. At that time there was relatively little difference in the cost of building wooden sail vessels, in general use, here and abroad. The act, accordingly, originally did not materially injure and, in some cases, may have aided American shipbuilding. In the present time of steel steamers, when the cost of construction abroad is much less than in this country, the general operation of section 4136, Revised Statutes, is disadvantageous to American shipbuilding. Even if the privilege of American registry were not extended to them in most instances, these wrecks would necessarily be repaired in American shipyards.

Only in the few instances where the damages are relatively inconsiderable could such wrecks be partially repaired in the United States and then sent abroad for completion of repairs. In such cases the vessels would not be entitled to registry unless a large salvage account has been incurred and is included in the repairs put upon the vessel. Under a ruling of the Attorney-General contemporaneous with the passage of the act the allowance of such salvage for half a century has been permitted.

The Department recommends the direct repeal of section 4136 of the Revised Statutes, as proposed by this bill. The reasons for this recommendation are further set forth in the report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1905, a copy of which is inclosed herewith.

Respectfully,

V. H. METCALF, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

[Extracts from the Annual Report of the Commissioner of Navigation, 1905.]

REPEAL OF SECTION 4136, REVISED STATUTES.

There are five ways by which a foreign-built vessel may be entitled to documents as a vessel of the United States—(1) by act of Congress;

(2) by lawful condemnation as a prize of war; (3) by judicial forfeiture for breach of our laws; (4) by annexation of territory carrying subsequent to it legislation by Congress for the registry of vessels belonging to annexed territory; (5) by wreck and repair in the United States under the act of 1856, now incorporated in section 4136 of the Revised Statutes as amended. Some of these processes date back close to the beginning of the Government, and the latest is about half a century old. Accordingly, it seems worth while to consider at this time only vessels afloat.

Appendix O contains a list of the foreign-built vessels admitted to American register from time to time and afloat on June 30, 1905. The total comprises 113 vessels, of 212,681 gross tons; of these 36, of 88,171 gross tons, were admitted by act of Congress; 24, of 38,996 gross tons, were admitted through the annexation of Hawaii, and 5, of 8,673 gross tons, were prizes of war. The remainder, 48, of 76,101 gross tons, were admitted under section 4136 of the Revised Statutes, which reads:

"The Commissioner of Navigation may issue a register or enrollment for any vessel built in a foreign country whenever such vessel shall be wrecked in the United States, and shall be purchased and repaired by a citizen of the United States, if it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioner that the repairs put upon such vessel are equal to three-fourths of the cost of the vessel when so repaired."

Since 1856 the Attorneys-General of the United States have construed nearly every phase in the ambiguous act just quoted, and in consequence the literal words above are far from conveying the precise meaning of the operation of the act. Furthermore, it was passed at a time when nearly all of the world's shipping was of wood, and the difference in the cost of building in this country and abroad was practically inconsiderable. An iron or steel steamer wrecked in the United States under ordinary conditions would be repaired here whether or not she obtained the privileges of the flag. Accordingly, the act is a deviation from the ancient policy of this country to restrict the use of the flag to vessels built in this country.

The Bureau perceives no considerable objection to the plain repeal of the entire section.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my friend, the chairman of the committee, if it is not true in the absence of this law there would be forty-eight less vessels with the American flag flying over them?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No, sir; they are nearly all of them sunk long ago.

Mr. LACEY. The report indicated forty-eight.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Here they are.

Mr. LACEY. We were interrupted during the reading of this report by a report from the Senate of the passage of a bill to put our flag on more ships. Now, if those ships have to be repaired in the United States and 75 per cent of their value is put into them, why should we lose the advantage of having our flag over those ships?

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is not a particle of objection to it. On the contrary, we favor it. On the contrary, if the gentleman will look at this report, he will find of the forty-eight more than half of them have been admitted by act of Congress, but it is stated by the Department we have no system by which they can ascertain the facts in regard to these vessels, and therefore they propose to remit the whole power to Congress and not permit a bureau officer to admit one of these ships without any action of Congress.

Mr. LACEY. Then, if I understand the gentleman, the policy of allowing our flag to float over a ship three-fourths American cost is not objected to by the committee, but it is merely a method of getting at it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is all; it is to get rid of a cumbersome and in many cases a fraudulent process.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has said this Department says that they have practically no way to ascertain, and yet I notice here in the extract from the annual report of the Commissioner of Navigation of 1905, this language:

> The remainder, forty-eight—that is, forty-eight ships—of 76,101 gross tons, were admitted under section 4136 of the Revised Statutes.

Which is the section you propose to repeal.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It would appear from that in forty-eight cases the Department did think that it had the means to ascertain and admit the ship to enrollment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The great share of these ships were of a certain class about which a full investigation was made, but I can only cite the language of the Department itself that recommends the passage of this bill. This is the first suggestion in opposition to it we have had from the time it was introduced in the Senate down to the present time. I am now trying to yield some time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. Will the passage of this bill facilitate putting the American flag on foreign-built ships wrecked on our coasts or would it not? If it will, I favor it; if it does not, I am against the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If they were wrecked here and had an honest case the facilities are quite sufficient for them to get in, but it will put them to a good deal more trouble than to operate all the year round upon bureau officers of the Government. I have not an expert knowledge of this matter. I am stating the unanimous opinion of every officer connected with the service in this country.

Mr. SULZER. Will this bill, if it becomes a law, facilitate or not the present policy prevailing in this Government to allow a ship built in a foreign country and wrecked in this country to be admitted to our registry and fly the American flag or not?

Mr. GROSVENOR. If it had an honest case, it would come without the slightest delay. If it did not have an honest case, it would give it a great deal more of trouble that it has now.

Mr. SULZER. The object of the bill, I take it, then, is really to throw obstacles in the way of the registration of a foreign-built ship wrecked in American waters?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman probably knows that some of the most rascally performances that have come to our knowledge in the last ten years have been the fraudulent introduction of these ships that have pretended to be wrecked and very often had not been wrecked at all. In one case it is believed that the contract price was put $60,000 above the value of the ship at the time, with a condition that it should get one of these registers.

Mr. SULZER. Is not the Department capable of ascertaining the facts in a case of this kind?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The Department comes and asks Congress to relieve them of that duty.

Mr. SULZER. Then hereafter every case of this kind will have to be submitted to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will look at the list he will find that over three-fourths have been already.

Mr. SULZER. The true object of this bill is to make the securing of American registration of foreign-built ships wrecked here more difficult. I am opposed to doing that, and I think the bill is open to serious objections. I would not make it more difficult; but less difficult.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Possibly in some cases more difficult and in some cases much less difficult.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. As I understand it, the object of this is to relieve the Department of Commerce and Labor of this extra work?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not only that, but to assure that the work will be done faithfully and carefully by Congress itself.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN].

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if the real purpose of this is not the demand of some of the shipbuilders to prevent any of these ships coming under American registry?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all, because if they did they would have to repeal the whole law.

Mr. McNARY. Is it not a practical repeal of the law to bring these wreck cases before Congress?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly not.

Mr. McNARY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether his notion is not the same as mine, based upon request from the shipbuilding interests, that this wreck law be repealed and, by taking the business out of the hands of the Department of Commerce and Labor, making it necessary for every man to come to Congress and there have his case thrashed out? That a complaint is made that a very large number of ships——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I have not yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McNARY] to make a speech.

Mr. McNARY. I am not making a speech. I am simply asking the gentleman whether or not his information is not the same as my own?

Mr. GROSVENOR. We have no such information. On the contrary, not a shipbuilder in the United States, so far as I know, has asked for the passage of this bill. It merely came as a request of the Department of Commerce and Labor. It was introduced by Senator FRYE in the Senate, the report made upon it, and then it came before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and received the unanimous report, and nobody has opposed it and nobody has asked for it except the Department.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Speaker, let me ask the gentleman from Ohio another question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. GROSVENOR. If it is a question; yes.

Mr. McNARY. It is a question. Let me ask him whether or not he knows what agency prompted the Department of Commerce and Labor to ask to be relieved of this work?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I know nothing about it. I assume that the Department of Commerce and Labor is an honest bureau of the Government, and I have no reason to suspect, by the insinuation of the gentleman, that there is under cover a system of fraud and rascality that is being perpetrated here by the distinguished Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Speaker, let me ask the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, if it is a question, I will.

Mr. McNARY. Let me ask the gentleman if there is any intimation of mine of fraud or rascality in the shipbuilders of this country asking this amendment in their interest, and let me ask him whether he did, when the Committee on Marine brought in bills of this character, oppose or favor the granting the right to register wrecked vessels, on the Colombian or Panaman coast, in the last session of Congress?

Mr. GROSVENOR. What has that got to do with this question?

Mr. McNARY. I merely ask the gentleman if he recollects his own words.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I recollect that I have opposed every fraudulent scheme to bring one of these ships in, and supported every honest claim that has come before the committee, and shall continue to do so.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. McNARY. I would like to ask the gentleman if he favors absolutely prohibiting the repair and giving American register to these vessels wrecked on the American coast?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not. I favor it; and, on the contrary, I am glad that the gentleman made the suggestion. The report of the Department of Commerce and Labor informs us that the making of repairs in this country will cut no figure under this bill, because if they have come within the jurisdiction of the United States, they will be repaired here, and the question of labor to the American mechanic does not enter into this question—not a single cent whatever. Now, I will yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New York. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. GOULDEN. I do not know; not long.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield to the gentleman such time as he desires.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, this proposed legislation simply amounts to repealing clause 5 of section 4136 of the Revised Statutes. In other words, it takes out of the hands of the Department of Commerce and Labor the right to grant American register to foreign-built ships. In the committee, of which I am a member, we had the matter discussed fully, and came to the agreement, that inasmuch as the majority of the steamers and sailing vessels in the last forty years were granted American register through a special act of Congress, that it was better to repeal that section. Congress should be the judge in each case and it should be decided on its merits. We find from 1865 to 1905 that twenty-five steamers were granted American register by act of Congress and only twenty-two were granted the same privilege by the Secretary of the Treasury and Department of Commerce and Labor since its creation. I am not here, nor are the minority of this committee, to grant special privileges to American shipbuilders, but we are willing to do all we can to encourage American shipbuilding if it is possible to do so without a direct subsidy. Inasmuch as a strong pressure was frequently brought to bear upon the Secretary of Commerce and Labor—so strong that at times American registers might have been granted when the better judgment of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor would have called upon him to refuse to grant it. The law as it stands does not compel vessels thus wrecked to have the necessary repairs made in American shipyards. We believe that it is to the advantage of commerce and in the interest of shipbuilding of the country to repeal that section known as clause 5, which reads:

> By wreck and repair in the United States, under the act of 1856, now incorporated in section 4136 of the Revised Statutes, is granted.
> Some of these processes date back since the beginning of the Government, and the latest about half a century old; accordingly it seems worth while to consider only vessels afloat.

I want to say this amendment has received the approval of the committee of the Senate as well as the committee of this House, and we believe it to be a proper amendment and that it should pass. We therefore ask that it receive favorable consideration at this time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask for a vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask to be recognized in my own right.

The SPEAKER. Unless the gentleman from Ohio yields the floor, the gentleman can not be recognized in his own right.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will yield to the gentleman such time as he says he desires.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman has not yielded the floor, I will wait until he does. I want to be recognized in my own right in opposition to the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio demands the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to be heard in opposition to the previous question.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman can not be recognized for that purpose while the gentleman from Ohio has the floor. The gentleman from Ohio having the floor, has the right and demands the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that; but after it is demanded there is an opportunity to debate the proposition.

The SPEAKER. Not in this case.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the previous question should be ordered then we would have an opportunity to discuss the proposition.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am quite willing to yield to the gentleman such time as he desires, but I want to get along.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yield me three minutes and I will make a statement.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will, certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill. It is a bill that is going very much further in principle and in effect than this House realizes, and one side of this debate ought not to control it. There ought to be opportunity to be heard in opposition to it in one's own right and not by the free grace of those who are in favor of the bill.

I hope, therefore, that the House will vote down the previous question, so that this bill can be debated.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Will the gentleman yield to me a few minutes?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri five minutes.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me this measure is one of sufficient importance, notwithstanding the committee has reported it unanimously, to receive consideration in the House before it is voted on.

As the law now stands, a foreign vessel wrecked in our waters and repaired under certain conditions stated in the law may become, by registry, an American vessel. The proposition is to repeal that provision of law, so that there will be no possibility of turning a wrecked foreign ship into an American ship, no matter how great the repairs may be, no matter how small the original value left in the wreck may be, compared with the addition made by the repairs, except through special legislation of Congress.

I am one of those who believe that whenever provision can be made by general law for accomplishing a desired object, it is better to accomplish it in that way than by special legislation; by special appeal to Congress in special cases.

It seems to me, therefore, that this bill ought not to pass; that upon the contrary we ought to permit the registry of these wrecked foreign ships upon terms more liberal, instead of absolutely prohibiting it by general law. Gentlemen will understand that the general law now permits it. The proposition is to repeal that law and to leave no way of securing registry for these wrecked and repaired ships, except by special act applying to each special case. Now, if special laws ought in any case to be passed, it seems to me that this law is wholesome and ought to remain on the books. The practical effect will be that when effort is made in the future to obtain registry by special act, we shall be confronted with the same kind of opposition to the putting of foreign ships, under any circumstances, under American registry, which I am afraid prompted the reporting of this bill, although the report is said to be unanimous. It seems to me that this bill is in the interest of a comparatively few shipbuilders; in the interest and in perpetuation of a policy which has well-nigh driven the American merchant marine from the seas. It appears to me that the slight increase in our shipping which may come in this most legitimate way, a way entirely harmless and unobjectionable as it seems to me, ought to be permitted.

We talk about rehabilitating the American merchant marine. Some people talk about the necessity of a subsidy for that purpose, and here we are about solemnly to repeal the only provision of general law by virtue of which a wrecked foreign-built ship may come under American registry. Certainly we are not very anxious to legitimately increase the American merchant marine when we are ready to repeal the only existing law by virtue of which it can be recruited from foreign wrecked ships. I think the bill, instead of passing, ought to fail of passage.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Certainly, if I have the time to answer it.

Mr. CLAYTON. I could not quite catch all the gentleman's remarks; but am I to understand from what you have said that you have given an examination to this bill, given it at least some consideration, and you are of the opinion that, instead of encouraging and enlarging the growth of the American merchant marine, it is a step toward restricting the growth and building up of the American merchant marine?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Undoubtedly I think so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CLAYTON. And it ought not to pass?

Mr. DE ARMOND. There is a law by which foreign wrecked ships may obtain American registry, and the proposition is to repeal it, and leave no door open to that registry except by special act of Congress in each special case. That is certainly restriction, and not encouragement.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he will yield me five minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if this matter comes in at all, it ought to come in in such a way as to give us opportunity for full and fair debate on the question. There may be good reasons for this unanimous report of the committee, but it seems to me that at present it is not satisfactory to the House that these reasons for the repeal of this law are clear; it may be that they have good reasons. As I understand it, they report this measure because such a large number of vessels are brought in for registry. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that on the list of foreign-built steamers admitted to American registry, presented in the report of the committee, there are in all only two that number exceeding 10,000 tons, and the rest run from about 195 tons to as large as 5,000 tons. The latter class are small vessels. Those are not as large as our coastwise steamers, not to speak of those engaged in the foreign trade. The report of the Commissioner of Navigation shows that only forty-eight vessels, of 76,101 gross tons, were admitted under section 4136, Revised Statutes, since the passage of this wreck act in 1852; this is a period of fifty-three years and amounts to 1,500 tons a year. This is no real damage to American shipbuilders.

I am not quite sure that in passing this legislation we are not injuring the American shipyards more than we are benefiting them because, as the law now stands, three-quarters of the cost of one of these wrecks on our coast must be expended in repairs on that vessel in the American shipyard.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. McNARY. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand the gentleman as saying, as others have been saying, that the present law requires that repairs shall be made in American shipyards. There is no such provision in the law as it stands, and that is one of the troubles and one of the reasons why this remedy is proposed—to get rid of it.

Mr. McNARY. Let me ask the gentleman a question in answer to that. Whether it is possible in a wreck which occurs on an American shore, at Cape Cod or Cape Hatteras or Florida or the Pacific coast—whether it is possible for a wreck of that kind to be hauled off to a British shipyard or an Asiatic shipyard and repaired there? Would it not be repaired in an American shipyard as a matter of necessity?

Mr. GROSVENOR. They have been taken off a great many times, and frauds of that character have been perpetrated.

Mr. McNARY. Where wrecks occurred on an American shore?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, not in New England.

Mr. McNARY. I understand that repairs have been made in foreign yards when the wrecks did not occur on the American shore, as in the case of the wreck on the Colombian or Venezuelan coast.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The law does not fix the place where the repairs shall be made.

Mr. McNARY. The repairs made on a wreck which occurs on the American coast must of necessity be made in American shipyards if the vessel is to be enrolled or registered as American. I know that when a wreck occurred on the Panama or Colombian coast it was not made in an American shipyard; but this law practically does not apply to that case, and it came in under a special act of Congress. I do not know of any vessel given American registry where the repairs were made in foreign shipyards under the wreck act.

As a matter of fact, I am not sure that the committee, in proposing this law as a remedy, is not going to injure the American shipyard in the matter of building up and repairing facilities. I come from a shipbuilding district myself, and I say that one of the important parts of the business, and one that we are anxious to build up in the port of Boston, is the facilities for repairs of vessels as well as the facilities for building these vessels. We need there a commercial dry dock for the repairing and refitting of vessels, and thus give employment to additional American labor.

Now, it seems to me that this matter, instead of coming in under a demand for the previous question, ought to be debated fairly and squarely, so that we may see where we are and that we may all be informed about it.

It may be that after fair and free debate Members who are now opposed to it may be inclined to favor it. For one, as it stands now, I am not satisfied, and therefore I must vote against this summary motion. Why not recommit? I believe that if sufficient protection is not given shipbuilders because of the cheaper cost of steel ships abroad that it could be accomplished by amending the act by providing that the cost of repairs shall equal the purchase cost of the wreck.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Ohio to move the previous question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the gentleman still persist in it and thereby cut off debate?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think the bill has been sufficiently debated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has not been debated at all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I have no great interest in the bill. I will submit it to a vote of the House, and if the House wants to kill it it can do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will vote down the previous question. I think it can be shown that this is a very dangerous bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GROSVENOR) there were—ayes 51, noes 80.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays; and 41 voted in the affirmative.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the other side.

Seventy-four gentlemen voted in the negative.

So (more than one-fifth of those voting being recorded in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 123, nays 109, answered "present" 13, not voting 139, as follows:

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I have just come into the room, and failed to hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the House when his name was called?

Mr. HOAR. I think I was in the attitude of coming in when my name was called, and I failed to hear it.

The SPEAKER. That would hardly bring the gentleman within the rules.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The previous question having been called, is there any opportunity now for debate?

The SPEAKER. Oh, it cuts off all debate. The very object of the previous question is to bring the House to a vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought I would have the Chair explain that to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is always delighted to impart information to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. The question comes first on ordering the third reading. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the engrossed bill be read.

The SPEAKER. Well, we have not come to that point yet. When we do the gentleman will be recognized.

Mr. SULZER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, is a motion in order to recommit the bill?

The SPEAKER. Not just now.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to be recognized, Mr. Speaker, when that motion is in order.

The SPEAKER. We will cross that stream when we come to it. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Senate bill for the third time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands the reading of the engrossed bill. The Clerk will proceed to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 1007) to repeal section 4136 of the Revised Statutes relating to the admission to registry of repaired foreign wrecks.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4136 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, reading as follows: "The Commissioner of Navigation may issue a register or enrollment for any vessel built in a foreign country, whenever such vessel shall be wrecked in the United States, and shall be purchased and repaired by a citizen of the United States, if it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioner that the repairs put upon such vessel are equal to three-fourths of the cost of the vessel when so repaired," is hereby repealed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, on that motion I call for the years and nays.

The SPEAKER. On that motion the gentleman from New York demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, is not the motion to recommit debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 105, nays 134, answered "present" 8, not voting 137, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The following additional pairs were announced:

For this vote:

Mr. CONNER with Mr. WOOD of Missouri.

Mr. OLMSTED with Mr. GILL.

Balance of the day:

Mr. LONGWORTH with Mr. AIKEN.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. GROSVENOR, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATIONS.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 345.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of the bill H. R. 345.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, can we not have the title reported?

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 345) to provide for an increased annual appropriation for agricultural experiment stations and regulating the expenditure thereof.

The question was taken, and the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. STERLING in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 345, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 345) to provide for an increased annual appropriation for agricultural experiment stations and regulating the expenditure thereof.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the present appropriation to the agricultural experiment stations of the United States is $15,000 each year to each station. As many of the Members of this House know, there is an agricultural experiment station in each State and Territory in the Union—forty-eight stations in all—which receive $15,000 each every year from the Federal Treasury. These stations have been established and sustained by Federal appropriations since 1887, when Congress first provided for them through the work of Mr. Hatch, of Missouri. The growth of the country has been very great and the increased demands upon these stations very great. They have done a work of as great value to the agricultural interests of the United States as that of any other single educational agricultural influence, and perhaps more. These stations deal with facts; they test theories; they do definite things; and the work which they are doing is not only valuable to the agricultural colleges which do the theoretic work and are looking for facts upon which to base the science and art which they teach, but they also teach definite things which are carried in agricultural publications of the Federal and State governments to the homes of the farmers of the United States. They have produced definite, particular results; and this Government, receiving from the agricultural population such strong support for law and order and those things which we deem desirable in this country, can well afford to extend this work at this time when the demand to further it is coming from every State and Territory of the Union.

Now, this bill provides a very moderate increase, and, in a nutshell, all there is of it is this: It adds an appropriation of $5,000 in the first year to each station, amounting in all to $240,000, and then adds $2,000 each year for five years, until the total increase shall be $15,000 annually to each station. So that at the end of five years the total appropriation to the station in each State and Territory of the United States will be $30,000.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The general intent of the bill, as I understand it, is to strengthen the work of these experiment stations.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Precisely.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am heartily in favor of the general purpose of the bill. Now, I want to ask you about one sentence on page 4, the beginning of line 7:

If the Secretary of Agriculture shall withhold a certificate from any State or Territory of its appropriation, the facts and reasons therefor shall be reported to the President and the amount involved shall be kept separate in the Treasury until the close of the next Congress, in order that the State or Territory may, if it shall so desire, appeal to Congress from the determination of the Secretary of Agriculture.

What does that mean and what is it put in there for?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I am very glad the gentleman calls attention to that. That is precisely the language of the Hatch Act.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not care whose language it is, but what I want to get at is the meaning of it.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. The purpose of putting it in at that time was a very wise one. It was to prevent the misapplication of funds that were provided for in that act; and several times the Secretary of Agriculture has been compelled to use the authority thus vested in him under it to prevent a misappropriation by the States of these funds.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to say to the gentleman that I shall support this bill cheerfully. Did the original Hatch Act contain these words in the third section, third page, of the bill?

That if any portion of the moneys received by the designated officer of any State or Territory for the further and more complete endowment, support, and maintenance of agricultural experiment stations as provided in this act shall by any action or contingency be diminished or lost or be misapplied, it shall be replaced by the State or Territory to which it belongs.

Is that new law made?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. That is the form of the original act.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is not any new law, and you have left it in the form of the original act?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Yes, sir; it has been in force for seventeen years.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman if this bill would cover stations hereafter created?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. It would not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, we are thinking of establishing one at Nashville, Tenn. [laughter], and I would not want to leave that out of any benefit it could get from the act.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. If the gentleman wants an independent station started, he will have to bring in an independent proposition.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Would you vote for it?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I think I would, in my present frame of mind and under the circumstances.

Mr. MANN. The bill provides for stations which may hereafter be established in accordance with the original act. The gentleman's own bill says that.

Mr. BURLESON. I think the new station would get its proportionate part of the funds allotted to the different stations.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If it does not, that is a defect in the bill which may be remedied.

Mr. MANN. This bill says "agricultural stations now established or which may hereafter be established in accordance with the act of Congress approved March 2, 1887."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is all right, then. So, as usual, Nashville is in it.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. It would only make that amount for the State of Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand; it only applies to the new act.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Unless some gentleman wishes to ask some question about this bill, I will ask that it be read for amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I should like to ask the gentleman a question about it. As I understand, this bill intends to provide a permanent appropriation, so that the amount will not have to be appropriated year by year.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. It does that, except as it comes in the regular appropriation bill. It is now carried in the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Did not the old law provide for a permanent appropriation, and does not this bill provide the same thing?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I do not think so.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The report says:

The Hatch Act of 1887 provided that each State and Territory should receive from the Federal Government $15,000 each year for the purpose of establishing therein agricultural experiment stations.

And this bill provides:

That there shall be, and hereby is, annually appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated—

And so forth.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. It is immaterial. It is always carried in the agricultural appropriation bill. It is a mere matter of form.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is a permanent appropriation.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. It can be repealed at any time.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is true, but I simply wanted to know whether you were adding to the number of permanent appropriations.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I think not any more than the original act.

Mr. BURLESON. This item will hereafter be carried in the appropriation bill, just as the Hatch item now is.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I do not wish to take the time of the House in making a speech for the mere sake of making a speech, and I shall therefore ask the Clerk to read the bill, unless some gentleman wishes to ask a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I merely wanted to say that, in my judgment, this is an excellent bill and ought to pass the House. I believe that there is no part of the public machinery in the States or in the Federal Government doing more good than the agricultural experiment stations. Their reports are of the highest importance; the research work that they are doing has been more beneficial to the agriculture of this country than anything else I know of; and whatever benefits the basic industry of agriculture of course benefits everything else.

This bill appropriates to the States and to the Territories $5,000 additional to the amount already appropriated, to be used by them in carrying on the agricultural experiment station work. I merely wanted to express my sympathy with the purposes of the bill and my hope that it would pass. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. How did this committee arrive at the amount that should be appropriated the first year, in addition to the $15,000, and the amounts for each of the succeeding five years, when the maximum amount will be reached?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. There are 48 States and Territories, and 48 stations which receive appropriations under the Hatch Act. This appropriates $5,000 additional to each one for the first year, and, of course, 5,000 times 48 is 240,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman misunderstood my question. This bill provides that in addition to the amount already appropriated there shall be appropriated the first year $5,000, and thereafter, for five years, $2,000 additional in each of the five years. How did the committee arrive at these figures? Why are we asked to provide these amounts in addition to the annual appropriation?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. The question is a pertinent one, and was considered when the bill was drawn. In my judgment, they ought to have the amount increased immediately to $15,000, but we considered the condition of the National Treasury and we wanted to make this appropriation just as modest as we could make it. That is one reason. The other is that in these stations there are nearly 800 workers, some specialists requiring special fitness and training, and we thought if we doubled the appropriations at once there might be a draft for that kind of talent which we would not be able to succeed in supplying, and so we make the moderate increase of $5,000 and provide for a gradual extension.

Mr. FITZGERALD. So at the end of five years the total appropriations under the operation of this law will be over $1,000,000 a year.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Was it the condition of the Treasury that influenced the Committee on Agriculture, or was it the fear that the immediate appropriation of the entire amount might perhaps make it impossible to pass the bill?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I would like to say that one theory of the committee is, and it is absolutely sound, that these experiment stations add to the material and taxable wealth of this country and thereby enhance its revenue? We believe that, and we believe that no legislation appropriating money for a public purpose can be supported on more reasonable or patriotic grounds and in the interest of economy than the appropriation which means the investment of money in order that we may get more money out of it. [Applause.]

When you put this money into an agricultural appropriation of this kind, you do not sink it in a battle ship which may be worth something or nothing [laughter and applause]; but you put it into a profitable investment that goes upon the farms of the country and makes better corn, makes better cows, bigger and fatter steers, better children [laughter], and happier homes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I think it would be an extraordinary thing to pass this bill, which will result in the automatic appropriation of more than half a million dollars a year additional to the amount now authorized, without there appearing in the RECORD some substantial reasons for it, and I know the gentleman from Wisconsin can, in a very few minutes, state the reasons which those of us who have not had the benefit of a large experience upon a farm do not fully understand as yet, and I hope the gentleman will continue his explanation.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, ordinarily anybody who had an opportunity to address so distinguished a body as the House of Representatives of the United States would be tickled to death to have somebody insist on his making a speech. [Laughter.] The only reason I am not venturing upon an extended statement is because I never talk for the sake of talking. I believe that this House is in favor of this bill, and I do not see how I could improve the situation by telling them why they are in favor of it.

I want to say that these experiment stations in the various States have performed some of the most remarkable experiments ever performed in the whole history of science, notably the one in Illinois, which has taken corn, a common food for man and beast, and done something never before attempted in all history—put 2 or 3 per cent additional protein into the corn, making it more valuable for human food, more valuable for animal food, a thing which ten years ago was supposed to be absolutely impossible.

At the Wisconsin Experiment Station Doctor Babcock worked out a system of measuring the value of milk cheaply. Years ago a man who had a cow that produced milk with only 3 per cent butter fat took his hundred pounds of milk to the factory and got exactly the same price as did the man who had a cow that would produce a hundred pounds with 6 per cent of butter fat. And now all over the United States, all over Europe, Madagascar, and everywhere wherever a cow is kept the Babcock test, brought out in the Wisconsin Experiment Station, is being used.

The friends of Mr. Babcock begged of him to withdraw from the experiment station, patent his process, and become a multimillionaire, as he certainly would have done if he had yielded to their persuasions. But he gave the information to the people of Wisconsin, the farmers of the United States, and the farmers of the world, and it has been worth more to the State of Wisconsin alone than the cost of all the experiment stations of the United States for ten years. [Applause.]

I want to say to the gentleman who wants definite information that the experiment stations in the South are doing a great work for the southern farmers in teaching them to diversify their industries, to do something besides the raising of cotton. The experiment stations have saved to the farmers of the South enough money through the analysis and exposure of worthless commercial fertilizers to pay for all the battle ships we have been building in the last two years.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; that you have been building.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Another thing: The grain growers of Minnesota and the Northwest in their association indorsed this bill because the experiment station in Dakota and the experiment station in Minnesota had developed during the last twelve years two varieties of wheat, hard wheat, the best milling wheats in the United States, that yield on an average 2 bushels per acre more than any other variety known, and that those varieties in the last two years in the State of Minnesota and in Dakota have been worth more money to the farmers of those States and the farmers of the Northwest than the amount of all the appropriations for the entire Department of Agriculture for two years. There are any number of other things I could tell, but I do not want to weary the House, and I do not want to get tired myself, if this House agrees with me upon this bill.

Mr. PAYNE rose.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman yields to my colleague I desire to call his attention to just one thing. There has been introduced in this Congress by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], a bill to repeal practically all of the laws under which permanent appropriations are made. As I recollect the provisions of that bill they do not exempt the permanent appropriations for agricultural stations, and that is one of the reasons why I desired to have the gentleman's statement appear in the RECORD.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this bill. [Applause and laughter.] It is true that our expenditures are running dangerously near our receipts. We would not have money to squander in any way, but we have money to appropriate for legitimate business and for the promotion of this great industry in the United States. I am in favor of it because I believe that this House, when they come to understand the question, at no distant day will reverse the vote which they took this morning upon going into the Committee of the Whole [laughter] and so cut off a number of most useless, extravagant, and unjustifiable expenses which the Government now is paying for the collection of revenue and for the collection where there is not any revenue.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. [Laughter.] The gentleman from New York is not discussing the subject-matter of the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I was trying to provide ways and means to pay the appropriation carried in this bill, suggesting the cutting off of some expenses in order that we might——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman should be permitted to proceed in order.

Mr. PAYNE. One moment, Mr. Chairman, on the point of order. I do not wish to transgress the rules of the House in any particular.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that we are in Committee of the Whole House and the gentleman is not bound to confine himself to the subject-matter of the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, this bill that I tried to get up this morning is most thoroughly misunderstood in the House.

Why, gentlemen have come to me who have ports where they collect $60,000 and where the expenses are twelve or fifteen, and they have said that they voted against going into Committee of the Whole for fear they would lose their port. I expected that some of my colleagues would come to me from the city of New York and say that it gave the President power to destroy the port of New York, and that they would vote against it and would not go into the Committee of the Whole. I desired to get into the Committee of the Whole in order that the whole thing could be discussed there and the House could thoroughly understand it. Then, if they decided that the bill was a bad one, they could vote with the gentlemen who have some local considerations and who might waive their judgment on the merits of the bill and be disposed to vote against it, if there are such gentlemen in the House, and I hope there are not; and if all of them together were in the majority, of course the bill would be lost. I brought in this bill because I gave considerable attention to the subject in the last Congress. A bill similar to this was introduced and referred to our committee, and I went to work honestly and industriously to get up a bill that would name certain ports and subports that ought to be abolished, and I found that the question was not one that I could solve with the means that I had at hand. I came to the conclusion the best way to do it was to do what has been done in reference to the internal-revenue system ever since it existed, giving the President power to establish and abolish districts and consolidate them the country over, which has resulted in such great saving to the country, so that the cost of the collection of internal revenue is about 2.01 per cent as against 3.48 per cent for collecting the customs duties. I thought if that bill came before the House the House would only be too glad to consider it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Not just now. I am afraid the gentleman will spring a point of order on me.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. He need not be alarmed, if that is the only reason.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I also found that the law for the organization of public-land districts in the United States was subject to the discretion of the President of the United States. He could abolish, he could consolidate land offices in the United States, and I learned, incidentally, from some of my colleagues, that land offices had been abolished in their districts when the office had become useless, and very much to the good of the service and very much to the relief of the Member of Congress, because he had absolutely nothing to say about it, and they could not blame him.

So the committee unanimously reported this bill. They were also induced to it because of some glaring things that took place every year in some of the so-called ports of the United States. Now, I read from page 4 of the report which I had the honor to submit with this bill, and which I trust and hope every Member of the House will read, because at some future day I shall seek the floor to move again to go into the Committee of the Whole to see if we can not go into the merits of this bill and see whether the House will pass it or not. For instance, I find that Albemarle (Elizabeth City), N. C.—why that is the State where the principal opposition came from to this bill this morning, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS] was appointed with me as teller to take the vote and afterwards called for the yeas and nays. I do not know how near he lives to Elizabeth City, but I do know, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Not now.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Well, later then.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, receipts from that port last year were $5 and the cost of collection was $1,606.90. In other words it cost $321.38 to collect $1 at Elizabeth City, N. C. Now, how many of you are willing to stand up and vote for this graft? How many are willing to stand up and be counted? And yet it was for the purpose of getting at this matter and having it discussed in the committee that I moved to go into the Committee of the Whole. I wanted a full and free debate on this subject, and for that reason I asked that we go into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLACKBURN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Not just now, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Chairman, I go farther. At Annapolis——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PAYNE. I decline to yield at present. At Annapolis, Md., they collected $5, the same amount, and that cost $929.41. I only read a few of these. At Beaufort, N. C., they did not collect a nickel, and it cost $1,400.01 to collect nothing at that port. And that is the kind of graft that we are asked to indorse.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The gentleman only had three minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. And we can not go into the Committee of the Whole House to discuss the question. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts has raised a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts state his point of order?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I make the point of order that the gentleman only had three minutes yielded to him.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman is mistaken. The gentleman from Wisconsin yielded me a few minutes.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I said three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Do I understand the gentleman from Wisconsin limited the time of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I think some time should be yielded on this side also.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I will yield the gentleman from New York ten minutes more.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have ten minutes more. I am very sorry I have not any more time, because I will not be able to answer questions during this debate. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will pick out some other States. I have been taking the list as I went along. At Port Jefferson, N. Y., it cost $12 to collect nothing. I think that is the only instance where New York figures in this whole list. At Little Egg Harbor (Tuckerton), N. J., it cost $303.25 to collect nothing. At Kennebunk, Me., it cost $95.17 to collect nothing. I hope gentlemen from these various States will take this list and give it prayerful consideration and compare that with their vote upon the question of simply going into the Committee of the Whole to debate this bill this morning.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER]?

Mr. PAYNE. I can not yield at present.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Some of these statements are gross misrepresentations of the facts.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I have not yielded, but the gentleman has made a speech. I am taking them from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the official report to the House of Representatives. The gentleman's quarrel is with the Secretary of the Treasury and not with me.

At Nantucket, Mass., it cost $870.55 to collect not a nickel. At Natchez, Miss., an inland port, it cost $500 to collect nothing. And then we come down to Paducah, Ky. It seems to me I saw some of the war horses from Kentucky gathering their clans this morning in opposition to the House going into the Committee of the Whole on this bill. They do not want this matter exposed, I suppose. I do not know why. At Paducah, Ky., it cost $450 to collect nothing. At Vicksburg, Miss., it cost $513.65 to collect nothing. At York, Me., it cost $253.67 to collect $2.70. There is $2.50 worth of justification for that salary, anyway. At Yaquina, Oreg., it cost $1,040.75 to collect not a cent.

Now, I have picked out a few of these cases. I have noticed since I have been in Congress a good deal has been said on the other side of the House in favor of economy and reform. Economy has been the watchword always with the Democratic party, except when it is in power, and still I noticed almost a solid phalanx on the other side of the House coming up and voting against going into the Committee of the Whole on a bill that did, what? Cut off possibly a few ports in the South, where Republicans are holding down a comfortable salary for doing not a thing the whole year round. That is economy, I suppose! That is the highest standard of Democratic economy.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I voted for it.

Mr. PAYNE. Once in a while there is a man who will stand up for it. I would like to look over the returns and see how near he is to any of these ports.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There is one in my State, I understand.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Can I ask the gentleman from New York a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, how much more time have I, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman has time enough to answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has six minutes remaining.

Mr. PAYNE. I will answer one question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I just wanted to ask the gentleman if he did not think it would be better ethics, at any rate, to remove the beam from the Republican eye before he got to fooling with the mote in the Democratic eye?

Mr. PAYNE. That is the great trouble with the gentleman. He is always anticipating something. In the first place, I want to remove it from my neighbor's eye, and then I will come into my household later, and I have just about gotten to my own household.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But eloquence, like charity, begins at home. It need not end there.

Mr. PAYNE. My friend is mistaken. He never practiced that principle in the world. He always commences at the other fellow. [Laughter.] I might enlarge on this thing, but why? Is there a man on that side of the House that voted against going into the Committee of the Whole this morning that is justified and satisfied by his vote, that wants his whole district to know that he simply voted against this measure affecting a port in his district, and where a Republican official was getting some money out of the Treasury of the United States for performing no service?

Now, I am coming to this side of the House. On this side of the House we are the real economists. We do not believe in being niggardly in the Government expenses, but we always insist that the American people should get the credit and shall get the return honestly for every dollar expended out of the National Treasury. What excuse is there on this side of the House to vote against the proposition to simply go into the Committee of the Whole House to consider this bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. PAYNE. I can not yield now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One question, which I think will help the purpose that the gentleman has in view.

Mr. PAYNE. If we need the assistance——

Mr. WILLIAMS. There are a good many gentlemen in the House who seem to think that if this legislation should pass it might result in abolishing paying, what?

Mr. PAYNE. I am just going into that point now, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One moment, if the gentleman please.

Mr. PAYNE. I know what the gentleman is talking about. I have just gotten to that point.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can assure the gentleman that it will help the proposition he has in view if he will answer the question. Will the gentleman agree to accept an amendment?

Mr. PAYNE. Now, there were gentlemen, some of them, who seemed to think that the bill was of this character—that the President would go to work and destroy ports where the receipts exceeded the expenditures, ports that ought to be maintained. Why, Mr. Chairman, some of them have worked themselves up to such a fever in regard to ports in their districts—ports that no sane man would think of abolishing—that if they had lived in the city of New York they would be afraid the port of New York would be abolished under this bill.

I was willing to accept an amendment limiting the scope of this bill, so as to abolish ports where the receipts were less than the expenditures, to put in an amendment that it should not apply to any port in the United States where the receipts exceeded the expenditures, and I presume under this statement that many gentlemen would like an opportunity to reverse themselves on the vote that they gave this morning, and that we might get into a rational examination of this bill, debate it, and see what there is of it, and what amendments were necessary, and see if we can not abolish this scandalous state of things of having so many ports existing for which there is no necessity. Now, I would go a little further than that, and state that there are ports that ought to exist where the receipts do not come up to the expenditures. I think Brownsville, in the State of Texas, is one of those ports. There are fourteen men there engaged, perhaps more than that—thirty men—and the expenditures are about $40,000 a year and the receipts about $6,000 a year, with thirty-one employees. But it transpires that it is necessary to have a port there in order to prevent smuggling along the Mexican border, and of course no Administration will abolish such a port as that. All these facts and all these things should be taken into consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York be yielded five minutes more, outside of the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ADAMS], in order to answer four questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I object. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of asking a question of the gentleman from Wisconsin. The gentleman has referred to the children and men of war, calling our attention to the needs of these stations and recommending giving them the $15,000. I would like to have him answer the question or enlighten the committee as to the amount of money paid to the various States out of the funds. Is it not a fact that the colleges each get the sum of $25,000 under the Morrill Act in addition to this?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. The agricultural colleges receive $25,000 each year.

Mr. HAUGEN. They each receive about $30,000 as interest money out of the land-act fund. Is not that about the average?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I do not know; I have not figured that out. I do not know what the interest is.

Mr. HAUGEN. I think these are facts the House ought to know before we vote on this bill. I wish to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the representatives of the experiment stations appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and made a statement that they were not asking for this money? Is it not a fact that the representative of the station of New York made the statement that the State of New York was not asking for a dollar of it?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman want me to answer? I want to say to him that the representatives of the National Association of Agricultural Colleges and Experiment Stations did not make any such statement. I want to state to him that Doctor Bailey, of New York, the head of that experiment station, and one of the best in the United States; Doctor Jordan, of the independent station, New York; President Snyder, of the Michigan Agricultural College; Doctor White, of the Georgia Agricultural College, and Mr. Curtis, of the Iowa Agricultural College, have all been here twice at this session, advocating the passage of this bill. And I want to say further that the National Association of Agricultural Colleges and Experiment Stations, which met at Washington before the meeting of Congress, favored this bill, and have given it and give it in every State of the Union enthusiastic support.

Mr. HAUGEN. I was simply asking a question as to the representatives of these several experiment stations that appeared before our committee a year ago. I have not a copy of the hearings, but I will refer the gentleman to the hearings of the Agricultural Committee a year ago.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am heartily in favor of what is sought to be accomplished by this bill. I have always opposed this measure only on the ground that I think there is no State in the Union so poor that if the agricultural interests of that State require $15,000 more the State can afford to pay it. I think any State in this Union can afford to appropriate that amount of money for such a worthy object, and I simply object to their coming to Uncle Sam for everything. That is my only objection.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move that we proceed to the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to make the point of order that such a motion is not in order at this time, that the Committee of the Whole can not limit the general debate. We will have to go back into the House for that purpose, and I ask recognition in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken, if any gentleman desires the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask recognition in my own right. Am I recognized, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has been recognized.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I did not take the floor so much about the bill that is before the House. I believe it is a good bill, that ought to pass, and I believe a large majority of the men on this floor are in favor of it and are going to vote for it; but I did take the floor to say something about the bill that met an ignominious defeat this morning, when we attempted to go into Committee of the Whole to consider it.

I want to say that I am with the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, in favor of the bill. The Secretary of the Treasury, for a number of years, has stated to the Committee on Appropriations that they could not wipe out the deficit in the collection of the customs revenues in this country until some legislation was taken by Congress to reform the customs service. Last year the Committee on Appropriations, in compliance with the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, reported a bill similar to the bill offered by the gentleman from New York, and brought it in as a provision on a general appropriation bill. A point of order was made and it could not be considered. Now the Ways and Means Committee report the same thing.

The executive branch of this Government has called the attention of Congress to the fact that you are wasting from a half million to a million dollars every year by not reforming the customs collection business of the United States.

The same thing happened in the collection of the internal revenues. Internal-revenue collectors were appointed in various places over the United States and the system could not be reformed by an act of Congress because it affected too many men and too many districts. Ultimately Congress passed a general bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make new internal-revenue collection districts. It was done for the benefit of the service, and it saved hundreds of thousands of dollars every year in the collection of the revenues of the country, and the country was not hurt by it. Now, the only proposition here is a legitimate effort on the part of committees in charge of these matters. Both the Appropriations Committee and the Ways and Means Committee have brought this proposition before the Congress. It is a legitimate effort to save the people of the United States from half a million to a million dollars a year in collecting your revenue.

Mr. HEDGE. Where does the gentleman get those figures?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will refer my friend from Iowa to the testimony of Mr. Armstrong, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, in the last Congress, before the Committee on Appropriations. I did not write the report, but if the gentleman will look at Mr. Armstrong's testimony he will see that that is what Mr. Armstrong stated to the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. The Secretary has simply taken one year for the purpose of making a comparison of receipts and expenses, and his statement shows that the saving is about $109,000 a year. We insist there would be no saving whatever.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am going to yield to the gentleman presently, and I do not care to have him make an argument in my speech.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I think this is right in line with the gentleman's remarks, and ought to be injected here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. All right.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. In addition, I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama that Mr. HEMENWAY, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, stated during the last Congress, in reply to a question from myself, that the saving would only be $135,000. We contend that there will be no saving, or very little, if any, as in all cases, or nearly all, deputy collectors would have to be appointed, and to get competent men the expense would be about the same as for collectors.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, in answer to that I will say that the list is given of certain ports, most of them on the seashore, but that does not apply to all the expenses in this country. Now, there are new cities built up. There has been no reform in the collection service for many years. There are a large number of towns that have the I. T. service—that is, the immediate transportation. If goods are landed in New York they do not hold them there until the customs are paid, but they forward them, say, to Cincinnati and the merchant pays the duties there, and it is so in different towns throughout the country. Now, there are towns in the interior where they have a customs officer, and the growth of the country and the change in business has changed the character of the commerce and it has changed all that service; for instance, I can not remember the name of any particular town now, but say the town of Chillicothe, outside of Cincinnati—I do not know whether it is a fact or not—but to illustrate, business has changed so that the duties may be paid all together in Cincinnati and leaving this office there with nothing to do. The officer is left in charge and the business has gone to Cincinnati.

Now, we can not bring in a bill before Congress to reform or change every one of these offices, because, if we do, that would affect so many districts that we could not pass it in the House.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES. You lodge all the power in the hands of the President?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. Why does not your committee go through and say what particular ports ought to be dispensed with?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my friend from Cincinnati——

Mr. JAMES. Not Cincinnati. [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I beg the gentleman's pardon; my friend from Kentucky—that the reason the committee did not do so, as far as I know, is that we thought it would affect so many States and so many districts, in a matter of that kind, that the committee did not believe we could pass the bill. [Laughter.] If it had advertised to the whole United States that this official was going to get his head cut off, and that that official was going to have his head cut off, they would all come down here with a petition, and in such a way that it would prevent the passage of this legislation; but we did believe that the House would be willing to submit it to the Secretary of the Treasury to determine how he could best and economically collect the revenues of the country.

Mr. JAMES. If I understand the gentleman correctly, he says the reason that the committee did not designate such ports as they desired to discontinue was because they didn't think they could pass it through the House?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. That is the indictment the gentleman brings against the House of Representatives, that if it knew the ports that they wanted to strike out, they couldn't pass the bill. Now, the gentleman from New York wants to do away with the ports in order to put Republicans out of office. I want to ask the gentleman if the President could not, if he saw fit, keep every one in office and consolidate the other ports and keep just as many Republicans drawing salaries as my friend is desirous to put out of employment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will answer my friend candidly. I do not believe if we designated the ports that are to be taken out we could pass the bill, because the lobby would be so great against it it would defeat it.

Mr. JAMES. What lobby?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The home lobby, the lobby of the friends who hold the offices.

Mr. JAMES. Does the gentleman think that the lobby he designates as the home lobby, the people, is a bad lobby for a man to consult in times when he wants to vote upon public questions?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all; not the people. I do not think there is any doubt but that the people of the district would want the economy, but the friends of the officeholder would want him kept in.

Mr. JAMES. Does not the gentleman think it is bad policy to lodge too much power in the Executive, who has already got power enough?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the House that I do not believe, as a rule, that it is wise to turn over the administration of matters of this kind to the Executive, but there are times that come when the legislative branch can not know all the facts. There are some reasons why you ought to continue a port even if it is not collecting enough revenue to support the port, to pay expenses, because there may be other duties required in that port—it may be necessary to sign licenses for ships, and there may be many other duties where it is important to continue that particular port.

Well, now, we can not go into all those facts. On the other hand, there might be some ports that are collecting more revenue than it costs to administer the running of the port, and yet it is not necessary to continue that port, because it may be so near to another port that it is a wasteless use of money and time. In other words, it might not be necessary to continue a port at New York and one at Jersey City. It might in that particular instance, but I am talking about where there is a river that divides two ports. One might be sufficient. Now, Congress or a committee of Congress can not stop and go into the detail, considering this question as to hundreds of ports and subports in the United States.

Mr. JAMES. Then the gentleman would force the people that he says would come as a lobby to the House of Representatives to present their case here as to why their ports ought not to be discontinued, to go to the President of the United States and there present to one man the same reasons he would deny them the right to present to the 386 men who constitute this House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all. If we put this in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, I do not think we would have any lobby. They would send their officers out and determine how the revenue could be most economically administered. They would determine what ports and what subports should be continued and abolished.

Mr. JAMES. Is it not also true that even in a port where they do not collect a cent of customs duties, where there are three or four rivers, that there are duties that have to be paid for and where it would appear the port was useless, when, as a matter of fact, it was a port very much needed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have just told the gentleman that, in my opinion, there might be ports where there was not enough revenue collected to support the port that ought to be continued, but there are many that ought to be abolished.

Mr. JAMES. But the gentleman was jumping onto Paducah, Ky., when there are three or four rivers there.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And that demonstrates right there that we can not settle this thing in the Halls of Congress.

Mr. JAMES. I would rather settle it here than have it go to the President of the United States.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] thinks that we ought to abolish the port at Paducah, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] thinks that we ought to retain it, although it does not produce enough revenue to pay expenses.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] if he will yield for a moment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think there is a general desire on both sides of this Chamber to pass the pending measure, and I am going to appeal to the gentleman from Alabama, who undoubtedly has the parliamentary position and the right to the floor, but having so much at stake for the agriculturists of this country, if it might not be best to defer the discussion of an entirely different measure until some future period, and as speedily as possible permit the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ADAMS] to have a vote upon his bill. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my friend from Pennsylvania that I did not bring this question before the House, but it is here. I have made a statement as to my views in the matter. I am sure I am heartily in favor of the passage of the pending measure, but let me suggest one more word. There are gentlemen here on this side of the House who take an opposite position from the one which I take. As the matter has been discussed, I do not think that debate ought to close without giving them the floor, and I intend to yield the floor to them and then they can determine what they shall do.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped the courtesy the gentleman always manifests would be shown in this instance, and that the discussion of an entirely contrary measure be postponed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would be glad to do it, except that I think it is just to those gentlemen that they should have the floor. I will herewith append the following as a part of my remarks:

A bill (H. R. 14606) to provide for the consolidation and reorganization of customs collection districts, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to establish convenient districts and to discontinue or consolidate ports and subports therein for the collection of revenue from customs, and for this purpose may subdivide any State or Territory within or appurtenant to the United States, or may unite two or more States or Territories within or appurtenant to the United States, or any part or parts thereof, into one district, and may, from time to time, alter said districts: Provided, That there shall be no more than 120 collection districts.

[House Report No. 1297, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 14606) to provide for the consolidation and reorganization of customs collection districts, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report it back with a recommendation that the bill do pass.

This bill is precisely like H. R. 7114, with the exception that the words "and for the interests of commerce and shipping" contained in H. R. 7114, lines 4 and 5, are stricken out.

Your committee adopt the report on H. R. 7114 as a part of the report on this bill.

[House Report No. 583, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7114) to provide for the consolidation and reorganization of customs collection districts, having considered the same, report it back with the following amendment, viz:

On page 1, line 4, after the word "districts," insert the words "and to discontinue or consolidate ports and subports therein," and recommend that the bill as amended do pass.

The reasons given for the enactment of this measure are well stated in the accompanying memorandum from the Treasury Department, which is adopted as a part of this report.

INTERNAL-REVENUE COLLECTION DISTRICTS.

The act of July 1, 1862, establishing the Internal-Revenue Bureau (12 Stat. L., 432), authorized the President (sec. 2) to divide the States and Territories into convenient collection districts and to appoint an assesor and a collector for each collection district, limiting the number of districts in any State to the number of Representatives in the Thirty-eighth Congress.

The act of June 30, 1864, section 7 (13 Stat. L., 224), authorized the President to alter the respective collection districts as the public interests may require. A proviso in the act of July 12, 1870 (16 Stat. L., 239), authorized the President to divide the States and Territories, respectively, into convenient collection districts, or to alter the same, or unite two or more districts or two or more States or Territories into one district, and to exercise such power from time to time as in his opinion the public interests may require.

The act of July 14, 1870, section 18 (16 Stat. L., 261), authorized the President to annex to or unite with each other two or more adjoining collection districts whenever in his opinion it will reduce the expense of collecting the internal revenue without impairing the efficiency of the service.

The act of June 6, 1872, section 43 (17 Stat. L., 257) ,authorized the President to reduce the internal-revenue districts to not exceeding 80 in number, and for that purpose to unite two or more districts or States or Territories into one district. This last section was repealed before a reduction in the number of districts was made thereunder by the act of December 24, 1872 (17 Stat. L., 403). The laws were incorporated in the Revised Statutes as sections 3141 and 3142.

The act of August 15, 1876 (19 Stat. L., 152), made the maximum number of internal-revenue districts 131. The act of March 3, 1877 (19 Stat. L., 303), reduced the maximum number of districts to 126. The President, in an order of June 25, 1883, as modified by orders of June 30, October 13, and December 5, 1883, reduced the number of districts to 84, and the reestablishment of the district of Nevada by Executive order of February 13, 1884, made the number of districts 85, which was reduced by Executive order of May 21, 1887, to 63. By Executive orders of April 30, 1900, July 1, 1901, and September 1, 1902, the number of districts was increased to 66.

The bill introduced in the House of Representatives on December 13, 1905, by Mr. PAYNE (H. R. 7114), authorizes the President to establish convenient districts for the collection of the revenue from customs and for the interests of commerce and shipping, specifically authorizing the subdivision, union, and alteration of the districts, with the proviso that the number of districts shall not exceed 120.

There are now 123 customs collection districts and 6 ports of delivery not assigned to any district in the acts establishing them. The district of New Orleans embraces that city and Shreveport, in Louisiana, and Cincinnati, St. Louis, and other cities outside of that State.

[a] Based on warrants issued.

[b] The cost of collecting the internal revenue embraces the following items: Salaries and expenses of collectors, including pay of deputy collectors, clerks, etc., and including expenses incident to enforcing the provisions of law taxing oleomargarine; salaries and expenses of revenue agents, surveyors of distilleries, gaugers, storekeepers, and miscellaneous expenses; paper for internal-revenue stamps, and expenses of detecting and punishing violations of internal-revenue laws.

[c] The expenses of collecting the revenue from customs includes all sums drawn from the appropriation made by Congress for that purpose. The money is expended for salaries, rents, labor in weighing, gauging, and measuring imported merchandise, revenue boatmen, repairs, and other expenses incident to rented buildings, stationery, and the traveling expenses of special agents, but does not include expenditures for revenue cutters, fuel, lights, water, furniture, janitors, etc., for buildings owned by the Government, nor expenditures for erecting new buildings, all of which are paid for from specific appropriations made for those purposes.

The expenses of collecting internal and customs revenue do not include the expenditures for salaries, etc., incident to auditing these accounts in the Departments at Washington.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Alabama permit me to say I am heartily in favor of the bill to increase the appropriation for agricultural experiment stations, the pending measure. The debate upon the question of the customs districts was not precipitated by us, but by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. We who oppose the abolition of the custom-houses and the bill to reorganize the customs collection districts are not responsible for the injection of that question in the debate on the pending bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, in view of the intimate connection between these two bills, is it proper for this committee to consider them both at the same time? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is being debated under the rules of general debate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Which bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill (H. R. 384) to increase the annual appropriation for agricultural experiment stations, etc.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, was not particularly happy in his charge that this side of the House marched up in a solid phalanx in support of these nonrevenue-yielding ports. A little more than a year ago when our Republican friends, who are responsible for this Government, were doing their best to find some means of economy in civil expenditures in order that they might indulge in military extravagances, I had the honor to point out to them certain avenues for saving. I undertook to show them from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury where a considerable sum of money might be saved each year without any detriment to the commerce of the country. In that connection and at that time I submitted some observations in regard to the continued appropriation for the Porto Rican regiment, so called, which is an annex of the United States Army, that the Secretary of War on two several occasions stated to the Committee on Military Affairs should not be continued, but which was continued by the vote of this House, and then, Mr. Chairman, I gave, taking it from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, a detailed account of all these ports where the revenues were absolutely disproportionate to the expense of their management. In order that I might not be charged with unfairness, in order that no man might say I had held up to the gaze of the country those ports which were conspicuous sinners in this respect located in the North, I began in the State of South Carolina. I mentioned Texas, I mentioned North Carolina and Virginia, and all the other ports in the country which, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, were no longer required for the discharge of the public business and the routine service of the commerce of this country. No gentleman need be uneasy about the abolition of those ports if they are needed for commerce, and I do not believe, sir, that the Secretary of the Treasury will consider solely the question of whether the expenses of the ports exceed the revenues.

If, as is undoubtedly true, there are ports where the export trade requires that an official be maintained, I have faith enough in this Administration, and in any Administration that the people will ever choose, to believe that they will be maintained no matter what the cost of the administration may be. Why, it has been pointed out by gentlemen on the floor this afternoon——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman from Texas forgive an interposition right there, in reenforcement of what he has said?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will state on yesterday I had a conversation over the phone with the First Assistant, Mr. Reynolds, and asked him what would be the policy of the Department with regard to this matter, and he said that no paying port would be abolished and very many nonpaying ports would not be abolished, because they would be necessary to prevent smuggling or in the interest of commerce.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Mississippi for the interruption. It exactly confirms what I was also told at the Treasury Department, and I do not think that any gentleman who represents a port of that sort, where its continuance is necessary for the export trade, where its continuance is necessary to protect the revenues of the country, need be uneasy for a moment. I believe that there will be just as efficient an administration after this bill shall have passed—as ultimately I believe it will be passed—as was the case following the enactment of the bill which consolidated the internal-revenue districts of the country, which reduced them, as I remember, from 187 to 66, and the tremendous cost of collecting the customs in comparison with collecting internal revenue ought at least to command the serious attention of every man on the floor of this House who professes to be interested in saving the money of the people.

It costs 1.85 per cent to collect the internal revenues of the country—and we all know that the methods of conducting the business of Government are extravagant—as against nearly 4 per cent for the collection of customs. It is altogether disproportionate to the obstacles which are in the way of the collection of those revenues, and, Mr. Chairman, I believe when the House has had time to think it over it will come to realize that the maintenance of useless officials at the expense of the Government should not outweigh the interests of the taxpayers of this country. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GROSVENOR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 58. An act to prevent the unlawful wearing of the badge or insignia of the Grand Army of the Republic or other soldier organization.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to certify to the House of Representatives, in compliance with its request, the duplicate engrossed copies of the bills H. R. 7085, H. R. 11045, and H. R. 11263 as they passed the Senate.

Also:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to return to the House of Representatives, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 143) granting an increase of pension to James W. Calvert.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 8773) granting an increase of pension to William H. Joslin.

AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATIONS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, how much time is there remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. There are thirty-five minutes remaining.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I disagree entirely with the gentleman from Texas. I believe that the longer the House takes to consider this matter——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield to me to ask a unanimous consent before he proceeds further?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent that the general debate close at the end of thirty-five minutes, and, if the Chair will indulge me, I want to explain why. This is call-of-committee day, and if the bill we are really considering goes over it will not go over until to-morrow, but it will go over until the next call-of-committee day, whenever that may be. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that debate close at the end of thirty-five minutes, the gentleman from North Carolina having that much time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the general debate close at the end of thirty-five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. I would like to say that on the affirmative side of this case there has already been an hour and a half expended. If the gentleman will ask unanimous consent that this debate close at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes, I shall not object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We are not at the mercy of the gentleman from Massachusetts. After the time has expired the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ADAMS] can move that the committee rise, and close the debate in the House. It can not be done in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I understand that perfectly well. The gentleman from New York may object, if he sees fit, on the ground that without notice the advocates of this measure, which has by inference been voted down by a majority this morning——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks that the committee rise at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes and report the bill to the House. Is there objection?

Mr. DALZELL. The Committee of the Whole can not close general debate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not ask that. I ask that the debate upon the pending bill terminate at that time. I am not calling the previous question in the Committee of the Whole. I am asking unanimous consent that the debate in the Committee of the Whole close at that time.

Mr. DALZELL. But the Committee of the Whole can not close general debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suggest to my friend, if my friend from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS] will allow me a minute, we can discuss this bill in the House—the bill we are all in favor of. When we go into the House we can close general debate and pass the bill.

Mr. SIBLEY. This is a bill that everybody is in favor of, and one that every man knows can not come up again until the next call of the committee day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask that the committee rise at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes. The other side ought to be heard on this proposition. I am opposed to the position taken by the gentleman from North Carolina, but I agree with him and with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] that they ought to have their day in court. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the committee rise at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes. That is a proposition that can be entertained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Mississippi, if his purpose is that the committee do rise and report the bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Favorably to the House.

Mr. MANN. Without reading? I will object, if that is the reason.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say to the gentleman from Mississippi that the bill will have to be read by paragraphs.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I will modify the request. I will ask unanimous consent that at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes the bill be read, and that upon the termination of the reading thereof the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. PAYNE. I suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], if he can get the consent of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS], to let the committee rise now, with the assurance that in the House he shall have the floor when we get back——

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I will say to the gentleman from New York that, inasmuch as this question——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I call for the regular order.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. This matter has been injected into the debate——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I call for the regular order.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. This matter has been injected into the debate by the gentleman from New York, and it is fair for us to ask it.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order has been called for, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS] is recognized for thirty-five minutes.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Now, Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, I believe that the more this bill is investigated the better it is understood the more objectionable it will appear to any Member of this House. I am prepared to discuss this question and wish to give the House the benefit of whatever information I may have upon it. Now, there is no reflection whatever intended by the position which I am taking upon this question, and the position of other gentlemen who are interested in these customs ports—including gentlemen upon both sides of the Chamber—nor upon the members of the Committee on Ways and Means. Not one particle.

I want to say further, in the beginning of my speech, that there is no political question in this matter. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] attempts to give an impression that there is some politics in it somewhere. There is not a bit.

It is a purely business proposition, and I am willing to treat it as a business proposition. There are gentlemen upon the Republican side of the Chamber and there are gentlemen upon the Democratic side of the Chamber, not only those who are interested in ports, but those who are not interested in ports, who are opposed to this bill upon general principles.

For myself, Mr. Chairman, I resent the imputation that just because I am interested, or the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] or some other Member of Congress is interested, in some customs port therefore we are opposed to the passage of the bill to reorganize and consolidate customs districts. I put it upon broader and higher grounds. Many of us have customs ports in our districts. Of course that fact somewhat influences us, but we base our opposition upon the language of the bill itself in the first place; and then, in the second place, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I insist, with all due respect to gentlemen on the Ways and Means Committee, that this bill is not in the interest of economy; that it is not in the interest of the public service. Now, what higher grounds could we put our opposition upon. Note the language of the bill. I will read it. Many gentlemen have not read it perhaps. The bill reads:

That the President is hereby authorized to establish convenient districts and to discontinue or consolidate ports and subports therein for the collection of revenue from customs, and for this purpose may subdivide any State or Territory within or appurtenant to the United States, or may unite two or more States or Territories within or appurtenant to the United States, or any part or parts thereof, into one district, and may from time to time alter said districts: Provided, That there shall be no more than 120 collection districts.

Now, Mr. Chairman, some of us contend that is in the direction of centralization and placing the power in the hands of one man, I care not how good or how great he may be, to discontinue any port in any State. Whether it is a paying port or a nonpaying port, he has the power to discontinue any port, to consolidate any two ports or make subports, or unite two or more States into one district, or subdivide a State. This power is too sweeping.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like my friend to permit me to ask him a question.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Well, my time is very limited, and I have a very great deal to say——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I gave the gentleman more time than I took myself.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, I want to know whether you think the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury would discontinue a paying port that the Government needed to collect the revenue?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, under this bill it is apparent to every Member of the House that this is a leap in the dark. We can not tell what the President, under the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, might do; and we do not want to put this great power in anybody's hands to do what he pleases with all these ports.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I may ask the gentleman this question: Suppose we accept an amendment to the bill providing that no authority is hereby conferred to discontinue or consolidate a paying port. Would that make the bill meet the gentleman's approbation.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I should say not, because——

Mr. WILLIAMS. That amendment will be accepted.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I think the bill ought not to pass even with that amendment. I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi, for this reason, because some ports may not pay for one year, or two years, but for a series of years the receipts and the expenses will more than even up.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Have you got the figures to show that?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Yes; I will get to that point in a moment.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I really have not time now.

Mr. JAMES. All right.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I have the figures here to show that, as to one particular port in my own district, the port of Beaufort, for a series of years the total receipts were about $143,000, and the total expenses about $51,000. I think the receipts will largely exceed expenses since the establishment of this custom-house.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many ports are like that?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I can not say. I understand that in the district of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER] there is a port where for a series of years the receipts are greater than the expenses. Now, at my port of Beaufort, N. C., taking that as one example, in one year the receipts from duties on imports amounted to over $50,000 on a cargo of railroad iron brought into that port, I think. In another year the receipts were over $50,000; in another year over $20,000. The expenses of the custom-house are $1,400 per annum. So these three years alone would pay the expenses of the port for many years. These figures are from a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury. It is true for some years past expenses have exceeded receipts. But this is one of the greatest ports on the South Atlantic coast as a harbor, and foreign ships may come in any time, and many will with the deepening of the harbor authorized by Congress and construction of the Panama Canal.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we say in the second place that this reorganization of customs districts is not in the interest of economy or of the public service. In the debate which occurred between the former chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. HEMENWAY, and myself in the last Congress, here is the record of what was said:

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, as I have said, if I withdraw the point of order, I have no doubt it will be renewed. This whole legislation is evidently a sweeping change in existing law.

Mr. HEMENWAY. There is no doubt but that the gentleman's point of order is well taken if he insists upon it; but I urge the fact that this will furnish information by which a great reform can be brought about and large sums of money saved to the Government.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. According to the gentleman's own statement in the RECORD a day or two ago, it will save the Government about $100,000 a year.

Mr. HEMENWAY. About a hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars each year.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Well, Mr. Chairman, the statement made in the RECORD was that it was about $100,000.

Now, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] makes the statement that it means a saving of half a million or a million dollars per year. There is Mr. HEMENWAY's statement, that it will be $135,000. We say there will be no saving.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am merely quoting from what the Secretary of the Treasury said; but I want to know if there is not some economy in saving $135,000 a year, and if that is not worth saving?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Well, yes; if there is a saving; but at most places you must have deputy collectors, and $135,000 is the maximum saved. According to the report of the committee, if you will read the statement of receipts and expenses, you will find that the committee took the year the Secretary selected, and that shows a saving of about $109,000 per year. We say that the $109,000 a year, according to the report of the committee, or the $135,000 a year, according to Mr. HEMENWAY's statement, is the maximum saving for the year selected by the Secretary of the Treasury; but that is not the fair way to look at this question or estimate a saving of expense. Take, for instance, the ports in North Carolina (and in the Secretary of the Treasury's report and committee's report the showing is made that not one of them pays expenses), under this Payne bill one or all of them might be abolished, or one or more made a subport of Norfolk or Charleston. I say if you will take a series of years you will find that the receipts will exceed the expenses. I have produced the letter of Secretary Shaw as to the port of Beaufort, N. C., showing that the receipts exceeded the expenses very largely in some years.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How long have those four ports in North Carolina been established?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Why, almost since the foundation of the Government. Wilmington, Newbern, and Beaufort are very old towns, date back to colonial days. They go back to the very beginning of the Government, and that is true as to ports in New England and other ports.

But, Mr. Chairman, to offset any saving, if there is any saving, you propose by this bill to put this great power in the hands of one man, and to inconvenience all the citizens of the country who are interested in commerce, and to inconvenience the commerce of the country upon the Atlantic coast, the Pacific coast, the Gulf coast, the Mexican and northern borders. Why, gentlemen, look at this list of ports, 142 customs districts shown here in this document from the Bureau of Statistics. And those ports, paying and nonpaying ports, are all to be placed in the power of the President to discontinue or abolish, or consolidate, just as he sees fit.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My friend overlooks the fact that where there is no revenue collected there is no business done, and where there is no business done how is anybody to be inconvenienced? What do you want to keep a port for when there is no business done in it?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I will point out to the gentleman from Alabama that the business done in these ports is not exclusively the collection of revenue.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course I recognize that; but the other is small business; and if it was important the port would not be discontinued.

Mr. JAMES. Not if you have a good political pull.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I will say to the gentleman, you may take any one of these ports, and while some years there are no receipts, the receipts for other years will be very large. And then, as my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] suggested—I was coming to that—these customs districts are for the convenience of the citizens and the commerce of the country. There are many agencies of the Government which do not pay expenses. We insist that these ports will pay in the long run; but the duties of collectors of customs are manifold beside the mere collection of duties upon imports. I have collated here from Andrews's Manual of the Customs Laws the various duties that have to be discharged by collectors of customs, not only at the large ports, but the small ports. Here is a long typewritten list, and I am going to read what these various duties are:

DUTIES OF COLLECTORS.

To take merchandise into custody whenever the entry is imperfect for want of bills of lading or other cause.
To examine invoices and see that no goods subject to duty, except $100 worth of personal effects, are landed.
To take possession of merchandise when invoice is not correct.
To certify to the correctness of the invoices upon entry which is proved in any court of the United States.
To act as shipping commissioner in ports where there is no shipping commissioner.
To see that no goods are unloaded until the estimated duties have been paid.
To see that merchandise is not unloaded at places where the health laws of the State do not permit.
To attend to the unloading of foreign importations by day or by night.
To examine carefully all manifests of merchandise.
To attend to the unloading of vessels in distress.
To protect the rights of shippers where there is a lien for freight.
To sell unclaimed merchandise.
To make a record of merchandise subject to duties and examine the same at port of destination, and appraise the same.
To enforce fines, penalties, and forfeitures as to smuggling, etc.

I remember the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] said last year that the customs ports ought not to be abolished because that would be an invitation to smugglers.

Many duties in connection with goods imported in bond to be exported when manufactured without sale in American markets.
To license vessels and receive and file the oaths of masters.
To record bills of sales and mortgages.
They have charge of transfers of owners of vessels and changes of masters.
The powers of deputy collectors are very limited.

Now, along this same line the collector of customs of the port of Newbern states in the letter which I hold in my hand that "in addition to collecting duty on foreign merchandise we have to issue licenses and enrollments to 262 vessels. These are renewed every year and a record kept in this office. All vessels have to be admeasured and bills of sale and mortgages recorded, etc." He says: "The duty on goods imported into this district by the British-American Tobacco Company for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, amounted to $33,728.36; but not a cent of this duty collected by reason of the fact that the goods were imported in bond to be manufactured and exported immediately. We have the same amount of work as would be necessary if the receipts from duty amounted to $75,000 a year. Your position that the collection of duties on foreign imports is a very small part of the work of the collector's office is true, so far as this office is concerned."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have listened carefully to all of these legal duties imposed upon the collector which the gentleman has read, and every one of them, as I remember, presupposes that goods are shipped into the district. There are lots of ports where there are no goods shipped in at all.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. No. At all ports certain duties must be performed, imports or no imports, by collectors, namely:

To license vessels and receive and file the oath of masters.
To record the bills of sales and mortgages.
They have charge of transfers of owners of vessels and changes of masters.
They must make a record of merchandise subject to duties and examine the same at port of destination and appraise the same.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman has read four items, and there are about twenty on the page that he has already read, and all the others presuppose the goods come into the port.

Mr. JAMES. That makes no difference.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. That cuts no figure, as my friend from Kentucky suggests. The duties of collectors at all ports are many besides collecting duties on imports.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have shown, or endeavored to show, that this bill to reorganize and consolidate customs districts is placing too much power in the hands of any one man. I have endeavored to show that it means no real economy, certainly a small saving per annum, if any, to the inconvenience of the citizens and the commerce of the country. I have shown that the collector of customs at the various ports have many other duties to perform besides the collection of duties upon foreign imports.

Now, I want to add this much further, that if you put this power under the Payne bill in the hands of the President, who will be governed by the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, you will be obliged necessarily to put at most, if not all, the ports a deputy collector of customs. You must have a deputy anyhow to prevent smuggling and discharge numerous duties.

Now, where is the saving of expense when you put the deputy in the place of the collector? You can not get a competent deputy collector to discharge the duties of the office for very much less than the pay of a collector. You will have to keep up your force; you will have to keep the boatman and his boat there to board vessels and examine the manifests and cargoes and to discharge the duties in connection with the enforcement of the navigation laws. You have to keep going all the expenses of the ports, except you may possibly save the small difference between the pay of the deputy collector and a full-fledged collector of customs. To get a competent man you will have to pay very nearly as much as the small salary of the collector of the port.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another consideration. These collectors of customs not only have many duties to perform besides the collection of duties on imports, but also at every one of these ports the most of them have an export trade that is to be taken into consideration. If you are going to proceed upon the basis that you are to make subports or abolish every port where expenses exceed receipts, which would include every port in North Carolina and some in Maine and Massachusetts and South Carolina and Florida and California and New York and other States, then you would abolish ports where these collectors of customs look after not only the interests of commerce in regard to the duties on imports, but also with regard to exports. The city of Wilmington, N. C., where it costs $1.41 to collect a dollar, had last year an export trade of seventeen and a half million dollars, while the port of Norfolk, where the receipts exceed the expenses, has an export trade with European and foreign countries of only $7,000,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman how many ports there are in North Carolina?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Four—Wilmington Newbern, Beaufort, and Elizabeth City.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman think they are going to abolish all the ports there? Does the gentleman seriously contend if this power is placed in the hands of the President he would abolish all of them?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. With this extensive power in the hands of the President I would say that we can not tell what would be done.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But does the gentleman really contend or make the argument seriously to this House that he would abolish all the ports?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. What we object to, of course, is the power. But I say this in reply to the gentleman, that there would be the possibility of making those ports—if you are going to proceed on this basis of receipts and expenses—mere subports of the port of Norfolk, Va.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, if they collected the revenue and covered the purpose, why not do it? What objection would there be, if you collect the revenues? Is the gentleman contending this merely to keep a certain number of men in office, or does the gentleman want the best means of collecting the revenue?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Certainly not to keep anybody in office. That rule operates both ways. If we have a Democratic Administration—and I hope we may have—if we have it some time in the near or distant future, these same officials will be Democrats.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the gentleman and myself would not vote merely to keep a Democrat in office if he was not needed?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Oh, no. I am not arguing the matter on any such ground. I repudiate the suggestion that I am against the Payne bill simply for the purpose of keeping my ports and custom-houses. Of course, that influences my action somewhat, but I am fighting the Payne bill on the high and broad and general grounds that I have already stated.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, they are talking about political influence, and I would ask the gentleman from North Carolina if it is not true that political influence could be brought to bear for the purpose of establishing one port and discontinuing another port?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Certainly, that is true.

Mr. JAMES. Could not political influence further be brought to bear to discontinue a port that possibly had some ancient Democrats in it and establish a new port and put in new Republicans?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES. So there is, perhaps, politics being played wisely on the other side of the House on this question?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Why, I do not know about that; but I do know this—that, on the part of any party or any Administration I believe such a piece of legislation as this bill will have a reactionary effect. I believe, so far as the Republican party is concerned, if you enact this piece of legislation, and abolish or discontinue or consolidate ports all over the country, on the Atlantic coast, the Gulf coast, and the Pacific coast, the effect of it will be to raise a howl against the Republican party; and, so far as the Democrats are concerned, we believe that this bill ought to be defeated—that is, many of us do, with all due respect to the gentleman on the Ways and Means Committee—because we believe it places too much power in the hands of the President, is no great economy, if any, and not in the interest of commerce.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to transgress the gentleman's good nature or that of any other gentleman, but we have been discussing a question not before the House for some time, and I want to say to him that for two years I have tried to obtain consideration for the pending measure in the House of Representatives. It has been reported by two committees, and very generally supported by the House. It is becoming very late, almost time to adjourn, and I want to ask him and the other gentlemen who have been discussing another question for unanimous consent to close debate at this time and proceed with the reading of the bill under consideration.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad the gentleman has given me the opportunity to say that I am just as much in favor of the pending bill in regard to the agricultural experiment stations as he is, but I am also opposed to this bill to abolish the customs ports. We did not start this discussion. It was injected by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], and it is fair to gentlemen on both sides of the House, Republicans and Democrats, that what the gentleman from New York said should be replied to, and replied to to-day, because it ought to go into the RECORD. We can not agree, therefore, to the gentleman's request.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have said about all that I desire to say on this subject. I believe this Payne bill a false economy; I do not believe there is any economy in it, and I believe if there is any economy in it, that it is putting too great a power in the hands of the President. I believe that the effect of it is going to be to inconvenience the citizens of the country and the commerce of the country more than the value of the little picayune saving which this bill may effect. Economize in some other way.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Here is a suggestion I want to make.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. The argument made by the gentleman from New York is predicated entirely upon the proposition that a port ought to be closed because its receipts were not as great as the expenditures.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Entirely.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Now, if we pass the bill based upon that argument and present those figures to the President would not he be justified in closing ports upon precisely the same basis?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I think that would be the result at many ports where the expenditures were in excess of receipts. These ports ought not to be closed. That is exactly what gentlemen on both sides of the House are objecting to as well as the general principle of the bill. Now I yield to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] pointed out, the House is not at the mercy of the Member from Massachusetts on the question of closing this debate. Under the rules, after the time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired, the House is at the mercy for the next hour of the first Member who gets to his feet and meets the Chairman's eye, whether he wears a red carnation or not. [Applause.] Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York, who demanded the regular order a little while ago, has no one but himself to blame if the discussion does not suit him. I have, I confess, a great feeling of sympathy for the gentleman from Wisconsin, who wishes to get to a vote on this most meritorious proposition. [Applause.] But if the gentleman from New York is willing to take the consequence of his own action, he will permit this debate to run on and move a recess instead of an adjournment. This will enable the parliamentary situation under which the bill of the gentleman from Wisconsin came up to continue in the morning, and will give a chance to be heard to those of us who are in opposition to the measure which by indirection we voted on this morning. The gentleman from New York is correct in saying that the House is not at my mercy. If we choose to prolong this fight, he will get on his feet immediately when the hour has expired, he will be recognized, and he will move that the committee rise. When the committee has risen he will move that the debate be closed, and then he will move that we come back into Committee of the Whole to complete this agricultural bill. He may cut off our debate, but not a whole phalanx of gentlemen from New York can deprive forty Members of this House of their constitutional right to have roll calls on the motion to limit debate and the motion to come back again into Committee of the Whole. [Applause.]

Now, I do not mean to threaten the gentleman with obstruction of that kind, but I wish him to understand that if we choose to obstruct the passage of the bill brought up by the gentleman from Wisconsin, its enactment could be postponed for two hours by the cooperation of forty Members. I do not propose to do so, but I am going to ask the gentleman from North Carolina to yield to the gentleman of my name from New Jersey, if he is still in the House, and if not, I am willing to reserve my remarks on the merits of this bill for another occasion.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I will be glad to do that, Mr. Chairman, but I promised to yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BLACKBURN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I yield first to the gentleman from North Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Two and a half minutes.

[Mr. BLACKBURN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER].

[Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask that general debate be closed and the bill be read under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that debate be now closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be, and hereby is, annually appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid as hereinafter provided, to each State and Territory, for the more complete endowment and maintenance of agricultural experiment stations now established or which may hereafter be established in accordance with the act of Congress approved March 2, 1887, the sum of $5,000 in addition to the sum named in said act for the year ending June 30, 1906, and an annual increase of the amount of such appropriation thereafter for five years by an additional sum of $2,000 over the preceding year, and the annual amount to be paid thereafter to each State and Territory shall be $15,000, to be applied only to paying the necessary expenses of conducting original researches or experiments bearing directly on the agricultural industry of the United States, having due regard to the varying conditions and needs of the respective States or Territories.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. I simply offer this amendment for the purpose of perfecting the section, making the language short and answer its purpose.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 1 by striking out the word "fifteen," in line 3, on page 2, and insert the word "thirty."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman if this does not increase the appropriation by thirty thousand, making it forty-five thousand. If the gentleman will turn over to page 1 he will find that the appropriation is made in addition to the other appropriation, and that would increase the appropriation to $45,000 instead of $30,000, as contemplated by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. The purpose of the amendment is to state in the bill itself exactly what is intended to be paid. Under the original act they received $15,000, and this increase is $15,000, and on the completion of this period they will get $30,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the sums hereby appropriated to the States and Territories for the further endowment and support of agricultural experiment stations shall be annually paid in equal quarterly payments on the 1st day of January, April, July, and October of each year by the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Agriculture, out of the Treasury of the United States, to the treasurer or other officer duly appointed by the governing boards of said experiment stations to receive the same, and such officers shall be required to report to the Secretary of Agriculture on or before the 1st day of September of each year a detailed statement of the amount so received and of its disbursement on schedules prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture. The grants of money authorized by this act are made subject to legislative assent of the several States and Territories to the purpose of said grants: Provided, That payments of such installments of the appropriation herein made as shall become due to any State or Territory before the adjournment of the regular session of legislature meeting next after the passage of this act shall be made upon the assent of the governor thereof, duly certified by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question. Is this bill simply a reenactment of the Hatch Act in every respect except the additional amount which is granted to experimental stations?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. It is.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That on or before the 1st day of July in each year after the passage of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall ascertain and certify to the Secretary of the Treasury as to each State and Territory whether it is complying with the provisions of this act and is entitled to receive its share of the annual appropriation for agricultural experiment stations under this act and the amount which thereupon each is entitled, respectively, to receive. If the Secretary of Agriculture shall withhold a certificate from any State or Territory of its appropriation, the facts and reasons therefor shall be reported to the President and the amount involved shall be kept separate in the Treasury until the close of the next Congress in order that the State or Territory may, if it shall so desire, appeal to Congress from the determination of the Secretary of Agriculture. If the next Congress shall not direct such sum to be paid, it shall be covered into the Treasury; and the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby charged with the proper administration of this law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to ask unanimous consent of the committee to extend the remarks I made this afternoon in the RECORD, as I want to place some figures in the RECORD to accompany what I said.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. If it is proper, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who spoke may have an opportunity to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the leave asked for by the gentleman from Wisconsin is not proper at this time. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee may return to section 3 of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I object to that, Mr. Chairman; it is very late.

Mr. GARRETT. I should like to state the amendment to the gentleman from Wisconsin, if he will withhold his objection.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I withhold the objection.

Mr. GARRETT. Section 3 of the bill reads:

That if any portion of the moneys received by the designated officer of any State or Territory for the further and more complete endowment, support, and maintenance of agricultural experiment stations as provided in this act shall by any action or contingency be diminished or lost—

Now, I want to move to amend, in line 9, on page 3, by striking but the words "by any action or contingency" and insert therefor the words "through any fault of such officer." It seems to me that such an amendment would be well.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I want to state for the information of the committee that this is the language of the original act, and it has worked satisfactorily for seventeen years. I do not think any good would result from the amendment the gentleman says he would offer.

Mr. GARRETT. I was not aware that it was the language of the original act.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill with the amendment to the House, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STERLING, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 345 and had instructed him to report the same back with an amendment with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 1057. An act granting an increase of pension to Caswell D. Ferguson;

H. R. 1201. An act granting an increase of pension to Edward Maxwell;

H. R. 4708. An act granting an increase of pension to William T. Wiley;

H. R. 5597. An act granting an increase of pension to Oscar Williamson;

H. R. 7302. An act granting an increase of pension to James G. Head; and

H. R. 11324. An act granting an increase of pension to Sarah E. MacGowan.

ADJOURNMENT OVER TO MONDAY.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Several MEMBERS. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 173, noes 39.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, February 19.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

Resolution.

The Atlantic States Packers and the Western Packers Canned Goods' Association, assembled as a joint convention at Atlantic City, N. J., on the 14th day of February, 1906, after having heard with great interest an address by Prof. H. W. Wiley, of the United States Department of Agriculture, resolve that—

Whereas the fruit and vegetable packers of the United States are conscious that there is probably no other form of food product sold which is so pure and free from adulteration as canned fruits and vegetables; and,

Whereas it is for the interest of both the canners and the consumer to have any and all adulteration done away with; and,

Whereas vexation and damage result from a multiplicity of partial, inadequate, and conflicting State regulations:

They hereby petition the Congress of the United States to forthwith pass such a pure-food law as the best judgment of the Congress shall determine, which law shall at the same time be stringent and capable of rigid enforcement.

GEO. G. BAILEY,

SENATOR FROM UTAH.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I desire to submit to the Senate a petition signed by several thousand representative women of the State of California, expressing their wishes concerning the exclusion of Hon. REED SMOOT from the United States Senate.

They also request me, in presenting the petition, to accompany it with a few remarks defining my position in relation to their demand. Therefore permit me to say:

The right to petition Congress on any subject is one guaranteed by the Constitution, and will ever be held sacred, and I do not think any member of this body would consider that any circumstances whatever would justify him in refusing to submit a respectful appeal made by any body of citizens.

The signers of the petition which I here submit are among the religious, cultured, and most public-spirited women of the State of California. They are to be commended for the interest in public affairs which their action in this case demonstrates, and I think it would tend to the betterment of politics were the earnest, intelligent, and conscientious women of the land to study carefully great questions and give to the country the benefit of their unselfish opinions.

There can be no doubt that whenever public-spirited women express their wishes in this or in a similar way, they are actuated by the best and most pure motives, which must and do command our sincere respect.

But in petitioning this body in a manner like that here referred to, a fact is sometimes lost sight of that we do not stand toward it in the relation which we bear to almost all other questions which come before us.

In this we occupy the position of both judge and jury, whose sworn duty it is to hear impartially the evidence adduced, to weigh it carefully, to admit for consideration only such as is relevant and of undoubted impartiality, and to render a verdict solely on the merits of the case as thus brought before us. We all fully realize the responsibility under which we act. The question that is to be determined, as I understand it, is simply whether a member is a good citizen, an honest man with character and all the attributes which command confidence and respect.

These sterling qualities of citizenship should, I think, be demanded of all who aspire to the great honor which a seat in this body confers. What may be his private belief in religious matters should have no weight in making up public opinion regarding him.

The same section of the Constitution that provides for the right of petition to Congress also prohibits Congress from making any law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise of the same. We should not regard a Huxley disqualified for a seat in the United States Senate because of his attitude toward questions of religion. However much we might regret that attitude, we should still acknowledge his great qualities of mind and heart, and willingly accord to him that profound respect which devotion to truth exacts.

So with the numberless shades of religious opinions which exist among mankind. Were we to take note in politics of simple religious beliefs, we should, in my opinion, retrace our steps to the period when religious differences gave rise to the most cruel of all the wars which have devastated the earth, and which reversed the spirit of Christianity in efforts to exterminate certain forms of religious belief.

Our noble system of government is built upon a foundation which is the more secure because it takes no account of religious opinion. Freedom of conscience is one of the surest guaranties of the Republic, and I am sure no action can be taken which will abridge in the slightest degree that right. In my opinion, eligibility to a seat in either House of Congress in no way depends on religious belief, and objections on that score seem to me to be barred both by the spirit and letter of the Constitution.

In case of opposition to the seating of a member of either House, it seems to me that the governing consideration should be as I have stated—whether or not a man is a good citizen, of unimpeachable character, honest and conscientious in the performance of his duty as an American citizen, and with no obligation to church or other organization that can interfere or conflict with his fealty to the Constitution and laws of our country.

I have offered these thoughts on the subject at this time that my position may be understood by the good women of California, for whom I have the most profound respect, and whom I have also the honor in part to represent in this honorable body.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I present a petition from several thousand of the women of Colorado, expressive of their wishes with reference to the exclusion of Hon. REED SMOOT from the Senate of the United States.

I was requested to say something in connection with it. All I desire to say, Mr. President, is that there are grave constitutional questions connected with the disposition of the matter that is involved in the proceedings against Mr. SMOOT, and, as far as I am concerned, I intend, by any vote I shall give, to be governed by the constitutional rights of the individual against whom the proceedings are being had.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. TILLMAN introduced a bill (S. 4563) to prohibit corporations from making money contributions in connection with political elections; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I should like to have permission to make a brief explanation of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from South Carolina will proceed.

Mr. TILLMAN. It will be recalled that in the early days of the session I introduced a couple of resolutions, one of which went to the Secretary of the Treasury, making inquiry in regard to certain contributions by national banks, and the other was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The Secretary of the Treasury answered in a letter which has been published as a Senate document, and as I expected. The condition disclosed was that as far as was known at the Treasury Department nothing of that sort had taken place.

The other resolution is resting quietly with the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with an understanding between myself and its chairman that should at any time any facts come to my knowledge he will call his committee together and give me an opportunity to show why this legislation should be had.

I wish to say in regard to the bill I have just introduced that it is an exact copy of a bill introduced five years ago by the then Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. Chandler; that it was reported favorably by the unanimous vote of the committee, placed on the Calendar, and died there, the Senator from New Hampshire going out of the Senate shortly afterwards.

There have been several similar bills introduced at this session—some in the other House and a couple in this body, I believe. I have not taken the trouble to examine them, but I know by their titles that they refer to the same subject-matter.

I want to say now to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], who is chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that I think I am in a position to give him or his committee some information which will warrant an investigation, and at such a time as will suit the convenience of the committee I shall be glad to appear before it and present some facts.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, the matter to which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] refers has been a subject of consideration with the Committee on Privileges and Elections. In view of what the Senator states, however, I will say to him that whenever he shall desire to make a statement to the committee I shall be very glad to comply with his request and call the committee together and hear what statement he may have to make in support of the resolution for an inquiry.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will take pleasure, if I am well, to appear before the committee and let the committee know on what I base this bill and also upon what I shall base a request that the Senate authorize an investigation of this matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. GAMBLE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $6,320 for payment to fifteen Sioux Indians of the Pine Ridge Agency, South Dakota, for property taken from them in 1876 by the United States military authorities, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DUBOIS submitted an amendment directing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to prepare a schedule of the improved lands in the Lemhi Reservation, of Idaho, ceded by the agreement of May 14, 1880, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PERKINS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 for increasing the facilities for the repair of seacoast armament, field artillery, and general stores at the Benecia Arsenal, Benecia, Cal., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. STONE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1548) to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the importation of impure and unwholesome tea," approved March 2, 1897; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

REPORT ON EDUCATION IN PORTO RICO.

On motion of Mr. FORAKER, it was Ordered, That there be printed, in addition to the usual number, 400 copies of Senate Document No. 60, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, being the report of the commissioner of education of Porto Rico for the year 1904–5, for the use of the commissioner of education of said island.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON PACIFIC ISLANDS AND PORTO RICO.

Mr. FORAKER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such testimony as may be taken by the committee or its subcommittees in connection with bills pending before it, and to have the same printed for its use, such stenographer to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

IMPORTATION OF IMPURE AND UNWHOLESOME TEA.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, during the consideration the other day of the bill (S. 1548) to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the importation of impure and unwholesome tea," approved March 2, 1897, the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] suggested that the provisions of the bill were not sufficient to guard against the fraudulent use or misuse of teas which might be imported under it. I have prepared an amendment to the bill, which I now offer and ask that it may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Missouri will lie on the table and be printed.

POSTAGE ON PERIODICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. STONE. I offer a resolution which I ask may be read and lie on the table, subject to my call.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas it appears from an official communication by the Postmaster-General to the Senate, in response to a resolution of the Senate of date December 15, 1905, and also from other official communications of the Post-Office Department, that certain periodical publications published by alumni associations of colleges and universities are not entitled, under the construction given the postal laws by the Post-Office Department, to the privileges of the mails as matter of the second class; and

Whereas it has been charged in the public press that certain periodical publications published by regularly incorporated institutions of learning are denied admission to the mails as second-class matter, under the construction of the postal laws by the Post-Office Department, contrary to the law itself; and

Whereas it appears from said communications of the Postmaster-General that, notwithstanding the construction thus placed upon the postal laws, numerous periodicals of the class held by the Department not to be admissible to the mails as second-class matter have in fact been admitted as second-class matter, and for years have, with full knowledge on the part of the officials of the Post-Office Department, enjoyed uninterruptedly the privileges of the mails as second-class matter, while at the same time similar publications have been denied the like privilege, thus discriminating in favor of particular periodicals as against other periodicals of like character; and

Whereas notwithstanding protests and remonstrances have been made to the Post-Office Department by the publishers of excluded periodicals against the injustice of such discriminations, the Post-Office Department officials continue the discriminations and favoritism complained of as aforesaid: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be, and hereby is, instructed to make inquiry to ascertain and determine whether, in the opinion of said committee, the construction placed upon existing law by the Post-Office Department is a correct construction thereof, and, second, to ascertain in what cases and to what extent discriminations and preferences have been authorized or permitted in allowing favored periodicals admission to the mails as second-class matter, while denying the like privileges to other publications of the same character.

Resolved, That said Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, and compel the attendance of witnesses; and said committee is hereby directed to report to the Senate at as early a day as practicable by bill or otherwise.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

TESTS OF FUELS AND STRUCTURAL MATERIALS.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask an order for the printing of 10,000 copies of Document No. 214. The 5,000 additional copies heretofore authorized have been exhausted, there being quite a demand for the document. For that reason I ask for an order that 10,000 extra copies of the document may be printed.

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the document?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is the report on fuel and structural material tests made at St. Louis.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would inquire of the Senator from Indiana whether the expense for printing the extra copies of the document referred to will exceed the sum of $500?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It will not. It consists of only 14 pages.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana asks for the adoption of the order, which will be read.

The Secretary read the order, as follows:

Ordered, That 10,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 214, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, "Fuels and structural materials," be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. KEAN. May I ask the Senator from Indiana whether there was not an order made the other day for the printing of an additional number of copies of that document?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes; for the printing of 5,000 copies, but, as I have just stated, that number has been exhausted, there being quite a demand for the document.

Mr. KEAN. That document seems to have quite a circulation.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will state to the Senator that there is no effort being made to circulate it, but the requests come from all over the country for this document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the order submitted by the Senator from Indiana? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the order.

The order was agreed to.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I submit herewith the letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the Board of Consulting Engineers on the Panama Canal and the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission thereon, together with a letter written to the chairman of the Isthmian Canal Commission by Chief Engineer Stevens. Both the Board of Consulting Engineers and the Canal Commission divide in their report. The majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, eight in number, including five foreign engineers, favor a sea-level canal, and one member of the Canal Commission, Admiral Endicott, takes the same view. Five of the eight American members of the Board of Consulting Engineers and five members of the Isthmian Canal Commission favor the lock canal, and so does Chief Engineer Stevens. The Secretary of War recommends a lock canal pursuant to the recommendation of the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers and of the majority of the Canal Commission. After careful study of the papers submitted and full and exhaustive consideration of the whole subject, I concur in this recommendation.

It will be noticed that the American engineers on the Consulting Board and on the Commission, by more than two to one majority, favor the lock canal, whereas the foreign engineers are a unit against it. I think this is partly to be explained by the fact that the great traffic canal of the Old World is the Suez Canal—a sea-level canal—whereas the great traffic canal of the New World is the Sault Ste. Marie Canal—a lock canal. Although the latter, the Soo, is closed to navigation during the winter months, it carries annually three times the traffic of the Suez Canal. In my judgment, the very able argument of the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers is vitiated by their failure to pay proper heed to the lessons taught by the construction and operation of the Soo Canal. It must be borne in mind, as the Commission points out, that there is no question of building what has been picturesquely termed "the Straits of Panama"—that is, a waterway through which the largest vessels could go with safety at uninterrupted high speed. Both the sea-level canal and the proposed lock canal would be too narrow and shallow to be called with any truthfulness a strait, or to have any of the properties of a wide, deep water strip. Both of them would be canals pure and simple. Each type has certain disadvantages and certain advantages. But, in my judgment, the disadvantages are fewer and the advantages very much greater in the case of a lock canal substantially as proposed in the papers forwarded herewith; and I call especial attention to the fact that the chief engineer, who will be mainly responsible for the success of this mighty engineering feat, and who has therefore a peculiar personal interest in judging aright, is emphatically and earnestly in favor of the lock canal project and against the sea-level project.

A careful study of the reports seems to establish a strong probability that the following are the facts: The sea-level canal would be slightly less exposed to damage in the event of war; the running expenses, apart from the heavy cost of interest on the amount employed to build it, would be less, and for small ships the time of transit would probably be less. On the other hand, the lock canal at a level of 80 feet or thereabouts would not cost much more than half as much to build and could be built in about half the time, while there would be very much less risk connected with building it, and for large ships the transit would be quicker; while, taking into account the interest on the amount saved in building, the actual cost of maintenance would be less. After being built it would be easier to enlarge the lock canal than the sea-level canal. Moreover, what has been actually demonstrated in making and operating the great lock canal, the "Soo," a more important artery of traffic than the great sea-level canal, the Suez, goes to support the opinion of the minority of the consulting board of engineers and of the majority of the Isthmian Canal Commission as to the superior safety, feasibility, and desirability of building a lock canal at Panama.

The law now on our statute books seems to contemplate a lock canal. In my judgment, a lock canal as herein recommended is advisable. If the Congress directs that a sea-level canal be constructed, its direction will of course be carried out. Otherwise the canal will be built on substantially the plan for a lock canal outlined in the accompanying papers, such changes being made, of course, as may be found actually necessary, including, possibly, the change recommended by the Secretary of War as to the site of the dam on the Pacific side.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 19, 1906.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 4. An act to amend section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by act of February 16, 1885, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

H. R. 7. An act to provide a seal for United States commissioners was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H. R. 345. An act to provide for an increased annual appropriation for agricultural experiment stations and regulating the expenditure thereof was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like at this time to call the attention of the Senate to the consideration of Senate bill 88. I ask that it be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks that Senate bill 88, the title of which will be stated, be now laid before the Senate.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 88) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I shall not undertake again to present primarily the questions involved in Senate bill 88, but there have been several amendments proposed to the bill, and the time for its final determination being near at hand, it seems to me that, in the interest of avoiding any haste in the consideration or disposition of those amendments, it would be well to take them up for such consideration as may be given them during the remainder of the morning hour.

Mr. President, there was some confusion when I rose to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 88) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulte-ated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes, and I do not know that the record is plain in that regard. Therefore I ask that the bill may be formally taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, I will resume.

It is my purpose this morning to take up for brief consideration some of the amendments that have been suggested, in order that any Senator who has proposed an amendment or who desires to propose one may, if he so choose, have it taken up for consideration at this time in order that the consideration of amendments may not be crowded into the last hours of the consideration of this measure.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. If it will not interrupt the Senator—and I presume it will not, for I understand he desires to know what amendments are to be offered to the bill—I will say that I have been requested by a great many of my constituents to offer an amendment which I will send to the desk in order that it may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rise merely to make an inquiry. Is not the amendment that I offered to the bill on page 8 now the pending amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that it is.

Mr. LODGE. I do not want to interfere with the reading of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. I offer the amendment so that the Senator in charge of the bill may be advised of it. I think the Senator is familiar with it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10 of the bill, line 8, before the word "ingredient," it is proposed to strike out the word "added," and after the word "substances," in line 13, to strike out the following words:

> And such fact is not plainly stated on the package in which such liquor is offered for sale—

And insert—

> And the label on the package in which such liquor is offered for sale does not contain the words "blended" or "rectified" or "vatted."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed.

Mr. KEAN. Perhaps the Senator from Idaho will accept the amendment now.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts suggests that his amendment is the first one to be considered.

Mr. LODGE. I moved the amendment, and I suppose it is pending in the regular course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is the amendment pending before the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. The first amendment was offered by the Senator from Illinois a few days prior thereto.

Mr. LODGE. He did not move it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think not.

Mr. President, perhaps it is not the regular order of presenting matters of this kind, but inasmuch as there are a number of amendments, it has occurred to me that I would call attention to all of them briefly this morning, so that we might get a general idea of the standing of the bill, and then we can proceed to a consideration of the amendments perhaps in a more orderly way.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho when he expects to take up for consideration the amendment just offered by the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]? I have a very large number of constituents in Pennsylvania who are violently opposed to the provisions of the bill as the Senator from Idaho has reported it, and I desire to support and to be present in the Chamber when the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is reached.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was my purpose at this time to take up, together with other amendments, the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. PENROSE. In view of my duties elsewhere in the building, I do not want to stay in the Chamber all afternoon while other matters, in which I may not be so greatly interested, perhaps, are being discussed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that no amendment can properly come up for a vote until Wednesday, after the routine morning business.

Mr. PENROSE. I want to know when the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is to be taken up for consideration.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am now proposing to take it up.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. In the matter of the unanimous-consent agreement, I do not think under this form of agreement, where no specific hour is named, voting on amendments can be held to be confined to the hour fixed for taking a vote on the bill, because there is no hour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that it would be out of order to vote upon the amendments prior to the close of the routine morning business on Wednesday.

Mr. LODGE. Do I understand the Chair to construe the unanimous-consent agreement as meaning that we are to vote upon the bill immediately after the routine morning business on Wednesday?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Before adjournment.

Mr. LODGE. We are to vote upon it before adjournment on that day, as I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The language, it seems to the Chair, is clear. It is provided that the bill shall "be taken up for consideration on Wednesday, February 21, 1906, after the routine morning business, and [the Senate shall] proceed to vote upon it and all amendments now pending or hereafter offered."

Mr. LODGE. I see the language as the Chair quotes it, but certainly the understanding was that that day was to be devoted to the bill, to the discussion of the bill and amendments, and that we were to vote upon it before adjournment. As it is worded, the strict letter of the agreement would require that we begin to vote immediately after the routine morning business.

Mr. ALLISON. And not debate it.

Mr. LODGE. I think the understanding was that we should vote before adjournment; and when the agreements are to vote before adjournment, I think the voting on the amendments occurs all through the day or at any time before the final vote. I do not think we are confined as to voting on the amendments unless an hour is fixed for taking a vote on the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would suggest that the unanimous-consent agreement provides that the bill shall be taken up for consideration on Wednesday, February 21, 1906, after the routine morning business. It shall be taken up for consideration at that time and the Senate shall proceed to vote upon it—that is, at the end of the consideration of the measure. That certainly was the intention, and I think it is the general understanding.

Mr. ALLISON. If that be true, then the first amendment may be debated during most of the day.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; precisely.

Mr. ALLISON. And there would be no opportunity to discuss, briefly or otherwise, by way of explanation, any of the amendments. I think it would be wise now to modify the unanimous-consent agreement, without impairing its main object, which is to vote on Wednesday, by providing in some way for the discussion of these amendments, so that we may all understand them. As that can not be done in a single day devoted to that purpose, it seems to me that to-morrow we should take up these amendments and have an understanding as to the length of the debate on each amendment and provide for a brief debate upon each amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to ask if the construction of the unanimous-consent agreement would not be that after the morning hour the bill is to be taken up, and we are to proceed to discuss the amendments and vote on them, and there is no limitation as to when the final vote shall be taken? Will not that continue until there is full debate on each amendment, and then the vote will come on the bill itself——

Mr. HEYBURN. Not beyond the day.

Mr. HOPKINS. Whether it takes all of Wednesday or all of the week?

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator that the agreement provides that the bill shall be taken up for consideration. (Of course it must be taken up or it would not be considered.) Then we proceed to vote.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. That means that there is to be no debate. When we proceed to vote upon the amendments and the bill, we are not to proceed to debate it—that is the necessary conclusion—but we are to proceed to vote on it.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. The construction put upon an order like that has always been that the amendments, without discussion on them, wait until we commence to vote.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. FRYE. Hence there would be no opportunity after we commence to vote to debate the amendments.

Mr. ALLISON. So I understand. Therefore I think there should be a modification of the unanimous-consent agreement—not to impair its main purpose, which is to vote on the bill on that day—by which we would dispose of the time to-day, to-morrow, and Wednesday so that there will be opportunity for brief debate upon the effect of the amendments proposed.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was in view of the condition of the unanimous-consent agreement that I gave the notice before adjournment on Thursday that after the routine business of the morning hour to-day I would ask the Senate to consider the amendments. I think it was the purpose—I know it was my intention at the time I asked for the unanimous-consent agreement—that the morning hour might be devoted, for the nine days intervening between the time I asked for the unanimous-consent agreement and the date fixed, to the consideration of this bill and amendments, up to the time fixed for taking a vote, which was on the 21st.

I may say that at that time I had an understanding that the statehood bill would be the unfinished business, but that that would leave the morning hour, after the routine morning business, free for the consideration of this measure. It is because of the necessity of giving more thorough consideration to this bill and to the amendments than could possibly be given to them on the day fixed for voting that I have called it up this morning, and I shall call it up to-morrow morning and the next and ask that the time be devoted to the consideration of these amendments.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Idaho, in charge of the bill, has moved to take up the bill, and it is now under consideration?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. Suppose some Senator takes the floor and discusses the bill till 2 o'clock to-day, and to-morrow another Senator takes the floor and discusses the bill till 2 o'clock, then this unanimous consent is ended, so far as debate is concerned.

Now, I ask unanimous consent, with the permission of the Senator, that on to-morrow and Wednesday the regular order of business shall be informally laid aside, without losing its place, and that there shall be a ten-minute debate upon any and every amendment offered by any Senator.

Mr. LODGE. The amendments to be disposed of in turn.

Mr. ALLISON. They might be disposed of then or disposed of later, but that the debate shall be a ten-minute debate on to-morrow and Wednesday.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator very well knows that it is very difficult to debate an amendment and then pass to another without action on the first amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. I shall be very glad to have the Senate pass upon each amendment after it is debated.

Mr. LODGE. I think the advantage of this agreement, which was substantially to vote before the adjournment on Wednesday, as the Senator from Idaho intended it, is that the amendments can be taken up and disposed of one by one in turn, just as we dispose of amendments to a tariff bill.

Mr. MONEY. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts when he proposes to do this?

Mr. LODGE. I think it would be wise to agree to the modification suggested by the Senator from Iowa, and devote to-morrow and the next day to this question.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to make a suggestion.

Mr. MONEY. With the leave of the Senator from Idaho I should like to say a word.

I wish to take the floor on this bill at 2 o'clock to-day to explain the substitute I have offered in the way of an amendment. As it is the time is not limited, but I do not propose to take a great deal, because I am under a physical disability, and I may not take five minutes. But I want to have the opportunity to speak to-day because of the unanimous-consent agreement to vote on Wednesday. That was offered on the 13th. I did not object to the unanimous-consent proposition, nor did anybody else, because no one wants to delay the final disposition of the bill. There should be some more extended explanation at least of the substitute I have offered than can be had under an agreement that debate shall be limited to ten minutes. For that reason——

Mr. SCOTT. We can not hear what the Senator from Mississippi is saying.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered under the ten-minute rule, after the Senator from Mississippi shall have had the opportunity of explaining the substitute, and that the regular order be informally laid aside, if the Senator from Indiana will agree to it, until the final disposition of the bill on Wednesday.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator intend by that that all observations on this bill from the time the Senator from Mississippi finishes shall be confined to ten minutes?

Mr. ALLISON. On amendments.

Mr. SPOONER. What about the bill itself?

Mr. ALLISON. I think Senators ought to have an opportunity to discuss the bill, and if ten minutes is not long enough to explain the different provisions in the bill, I suppose additional time will be given by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPOONER. It never has been customary, in fixing a time for a vote, to limit general debate to ten minutes.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not speaking of general debate, but of debate on the amendments.

Mr. HEYBURN. Before the suggestion of a modification of the unanimous-consent agreement is taken up for consideration I should like to inquire whether there is anything in the practice or the rules of this body which would prevent it from taking up and disposing of amendments, notwithstanding the fact that a day has been fixed for the final vote? The bill is now before the Senate regularly, as any other bill would be, and we now have time to consider amendments and to vote upon them by unanimous consent after the arguments have been concluded. We may vote upon these amendments at any time, as I understand the rule, without waiting for the arrival of the day fixed to take a final vote, because the matter is regularly before the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the Chair rules that under the unanimous-consent agreement voting begins on Wednesday; but, of course, that can be modified by unanimous consent. So, if we want to take up the amendments and vote on them to-day, after a little debate, it can be done. I do not wish to interfere with the plans of the Senator from Idaho. All I desire is that we shall have some intelligent, short debate upon these amendments—some of them, I am sure, are of great importance—before we are called upon to vote finally on Wednesday, which, I think, under the agreement, we are required to do after the routine morning business.

Mr. HEYBURN. Without disturbing the existing unanimous-consent agreement as to the final vote being taken on the 21st, I think the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa that debate on the amendments be limited to ten minutes is a good one, because I think the amendments are of such a character that they could readily be disposed of with such consideration. I am perfectly willing that a unanimous-consent order may be entered now, without disturbing the unanimous-consent order for the final vote, fixing the hour on the 21st, say at 5 o'clock, leaving the time up to 5 o'clock for the consideration of this bill and the amendments. That would be agreeable to me.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Wisconsin, under such an arrangement, would not have an opportunity, with other Senators, for general debate on the bill; and I wish to guard that as it should be guarded. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the consideration of the bill be continued to-day, to-morrow, and on Wednesday, until disposed of, under the ten-minute rule.

Mr. HEYBURN, Mr. BURROWS, and others. Fix an hour.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall be glad to fix the hour at 5 o'clock.

Mr. HEYBURN. Or before adjournment.

Mr. BURROWS. No; 5 o'clock.

Mr. NELSON. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that he add to that request that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for that purpose.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to include in the unanimous-consent agreement the condition that the unfinished business shall not be disturbed, except for this purpose, and that it shall continue to be the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. MONEY. I desire to make an inquiry. I do not understand clearly whether the Senator from Iowa intended that the ten-minute debate should begin to-day or whether the general debate will proceed to-day and the ten-minute debate on Wednesday, the day fixed by the unanimous-consent agreement for the consideration and disposition of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. My purpose was that the Senator from Mississippi should have an opportunity unlimited to explain his substitute, and then that the ten-minute rule should follow to-day and to-morrow and on Wednesday until the final vote is to be taken at 5 o'clock.

Mr. MONEY. That does not anticipate that there will be a vote upon any amendment until Wednesday?

Mr. ALLISON. I should prefer to have the amendments voted on as they are considered under the ten-minute rule.

Mr. MONEY. There is an objection to that request in this respect: When the request for unanimous consent was made, it was for a vote on Wednesday. That was consented to, because nobody wanted to delay the bill. It may be, while I do not know that it is the case, that some Senators are absent who would like to be here when amendments are voted upon. It is a sort of foreclosure of them, depriving them of their right to vote, because they have no right to expect a vote until the time agreed upon by the whole Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I will again modify my suggestion, which is that the bill shall be considered to-day under the general rule of debate, and that to-morrow and Wednesday the ten-minute rule for debate shall apply, and that amendments be voted on as they are reached. That gives every Senator notice that there will be no vote to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent——

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I do not think I could give my consent to an arrangement which includes beginning to vote on the amendments prior to the time fixed in the unanimous-consent agreement. There may be Senators who are absent with the understanding that the voting will begin on Wednesday; and I can not see that we are going to gain any particular time by adopting the suggestion. There is certainly time enough to vote on Wednesday. That was the unanimous-consent agreement. I want to say that I think the unanimous-consent agreement would not have been made except with the idea of voting on Wednesday.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. If there is no change in the agreement, on Wednesday, immediately after the routine business, all voting must take place, and no debate.

Mr. MONEY. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. So as the agreement stands now, the debate can only be had to-day and to-morrow. If Senators do not want to have any ten-minute debate either to-day or to-morrow, the amendments will be voted on without debate.

Mr. MONEY. As I understand the request for unanimous consent, it was that all amendments pending or that might be offered would be voted upon on Wednesday, under the five-minute rule for debate.

Mr. HEYBURN. The ten-minute rule.

Mr. MONEY. No. Your original proposition was for five-minute debate, was it not?

Mr. ALLISON. That is not embodied in the agreement.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not a part of it.

Mr. LODGE. Under the original agreement, as it stands printed on the Calendar, you would have to vote immediately after the routine morning business on Wednesday without debate. The Senator from Iowa by his proposition extends the debate for one day, practically.

Mr. ALLISON. It extends it.

Mr. MONEY. It does not make a particle of difference to me——

Mr. BACON (to Mr. MONEY). Speak louder. We can not hear what you say.

Mr. MONEY. As I said, it does not make a particle of difference to me when the voting begins; but I want to protect those who are absent. Of course, there is a general desire that the vote shall take place on the amendments as they are debated. I am ready to begin at any time. I am only speaking in behalf of those who otherwise would not have consented to the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. ALLISON. I will restate my proposition, which is that after the Senator from Mississippi shall have concluded his remarks, during to-day, to-morrow, and Wednesday we proceed to debate the amendments to the bill under the ten-minute rule, and take a vote on the bill by 5 o'clock on Wednesday.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I believe I have the floor. I have not yielded the floor. I will yield to the Senator from Colorado, however.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, all I wanted to say is, that it seems to me if any Senator wants to debate this bill he has to-day and to-morrow to do it, and he ought to have the right to do it on those two days without any limitation. I do not want to debate it at all. I understand the Senator from Iowa proposes to limit the right of debate to-day and to-morrow. Is there any necessity for doing that?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know that there is.

Mr. TELLER. Then do not do it.

Mr. ALLISON. I will suggest, then, that to-morrow and Wednesday be set apart for ten-minute debate, and that at 4 o'clock, instead of 5, we begin to vote upon the amendments and the bill.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Iowa, and that is that a particular hour be not designated. The effect when a particular hour is designated for a vote is simply that the debate is participated in by a handful of Senators. Other Senators do not hear that debate, and come in at the designated hour and vote on the question without having heard what has been said pro or con. On the contrary, if we simply say we will vote that day, then, of course, no specific hour is fixed, and there is some chance that Senators will hear something of the debate. I am sure that has been our experience in the past.

Mr. HEYBURN. Before the request for unanimous consent is put, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Iowa, inasmuch as there are pending a substitute for the entire bill, proposed by the Senator from Mississippi, and other amendments, which go very largely to the substance of the bill, those having the bill in charge would not want to be limited to ten minutes in meeting the arguments of Senators who favor the substitute. It was my purpose in addressing the Senate this morning to anticipate somewhat the argument in favor of the substitute and the amendments.

I understand the Senator from Mississippi desires to take the floor at 2 o'clock, and it might be that after the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi, he would be in a better position to take up any question of changing the unanimous-consent agreement, which, of course, stands in the absence of any change.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw my suggestion.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will then proceed to explain somewhat the objections to the substitute.

Mr. PILES. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I wish to submit a proposed amendment to the pending bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 20, after the word "section," insert the following:

In case of evaporated milk, or so-called evaporated cream, if the same shall contain 25 per cent solids, of which solids 28 per cent shall be butter fat.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the substitute offered by the Senator from Mississippi, to which he will address his remarks at 2 o'clock, as I understand it, eliminates the manufacturer from the consideration of this measure and provides, in substance, that the goods shall not be introduced into the jurisdiction of a State other than that in which it is manufactured, thus making the introduction the only offense under the law.

At the last session of Congress the principal objection, and, in my judgment, the strongest objection, which was urged against the measure was that its provisions were not directed specifically enough against the manufacturer of the goods of the character prohibited or intended to be prohibited by the act.

The substitute offered by the Senator from Mississippi is a very radical departure from the plan of legislation presented by the bill reported by the committee. It provides that it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to ship, transport, or deliver for shipment or transportation from one State to another, etc., making that the prime offense.

I merely make these suggestions that the Senator from Mississippi in supporting his substitute may be advised as to the manner in which it presents itself to the minds of the committee or to my mind.

Then, again, in section 14 of the substitute offered by the Senator from Mississippi, in the definition of drugs it is provided that—

The term "drug" as used in this act shall mean all drugs, medicines, and preparations intended for medicinal purposes and recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia or the National Formulary as drugs or medicines for internal or external use.

And that is the limit of the prohibition. That, of course, does not include patent medicines or the many nostrums that are sold as drugs.

So the substitute offered by the Senator from Mississippi excepts, first, the manufacturers out of its provision, and, second, the patent-medicine men, two of the principal sources of evil at which this legislation is directed.

There are other objections to the substitute offered by the Senator from Mississippi that will be referred to after he has presented his views in support of it.

Now, as to the amendment offered this morning by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]. It is the one referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. It is supported by what is known or may be denominated as the "liquor interests." It is an attempt to take out of the bill which your committee has reported every element of protection against the very evil, so far as that trade is concerned, to which the bill is directed. It is proposed, in line 8, on page 10, to strike out the word "added." That represents a controversy between what is known as the "strict whisky men" and the blenders or rectifiers. The paragraph reads:

In the case of liquors, an article shall be deemed adulterated if it contain any added ingredient of a poisonous or deleterious character.
